The Grand Sacred Concert took place according to advertisement, on Wednesday evening last, in St. Peter's Church. The attendance was both numerous and respectable, and the execution as well as the selection of the music, fully sustained the high character which had been anticipated for it. Without entering upon invidious distinctions concerning musicians of whom it has not been our privilege to have familiar acquaintance, it may yet be allowed to us to express the extreme satisfaction that was experienced by the audience, of the capacity and melody of the Organ, when its powers were tested by the masterly hand of Mons. Labelle. There is, however, another reflection incidental to the evening's entertainment, which from its agreeableness, deserves to be recorded among the pleasures of the evening. It having been understood that, besides the natural desire of the congregation proper of St. Peter's to witness the performances, there was also a strong inclination among the unattached, to be admitted to share in the enjoyment, a special acknowledgment was made of the presence of such strangers; and upon their appearance at the door, they were conducted by gentlemen in waiting, to seats in the best situations, which had apparently been set apart for their accommodation; and we are happy to remark that it was not an idle office, as a large share of the company was of this character, who were thus saved by a courteous and friendly feeling, from the embarrassment commonly attending a casual visit to the sacred edifices of a separate church.

Parliament will not sit from Wednesday the 24th instant, until Wednesday, April 7th; this being the Easter holidays.

A Bill has passed the Legislative Council and is now before the House of Assembly whose provisions are to enable juries to return verdicts in civil cases without being unanimous; as the bill came down to the House of Assembly, it will be sufficient that nine out of the twelve agree to find a verdict. There is much force in the arguments brought forward in support of the change, and the only opposition it meets with is on the ground of interference with long established usage. The bill will likely receive the assent of a majority of the members from Upper Canada, and therefore ought to become Law, since it applies to Upper Canada only.

The Bowes Case.

In the appeal of Bowes against the City of Toronto, before the judicial committee of the Privy Council in England, the decree of the Court of Chancery of Upper Canada has been confirmed, requiring Mr. Bowes to discharge the £10,000 he abstracted from his employers. As his case is not without its type in Peterboro, we publish the reported judgement, and hope it will prove interesting to the gentleman who stands in the same position with regard to the town of Peterboro, that Mr. Bowes did to the City of Toronto, viz, their trustee and agent.

The following is the judgment:—

"It does not appear to their Lordships important on either side to lay stress on any other parts of the voluminous evidence before them. The leading and weighty facts, shown by what has now been read, cannot admit of doubt; and upon the whole of the materials in the case their Lordships feeling very high respect for the opinions of the dissentient minority of judges in the Court of Error and Appeal, cannot but feel also some surprise that there should not have been an unanimous affirmance of the decision of the Court of Chancery, so far at least as it declared and enforced the liability of the appellant to the respondent for the ascertained and unquestioned amount of profit made and received by the appellant or his firm of Bowes and Hall, from the transaction in which he had permitted himself to engage respecting the corporation debentures. The appellant's allegation that this profit was made and received by him on behalf, not of himself alone, but of himself and partner Mr. Hall, which we assume to be correct in point of fact, we think immaterial. It does not, in their Lordships' opinion, diminish the appellant's liability to the respondent, or give the appellant any title to be treated otherwise than as he would have been liable to be treated, if he alone had been interested with Mr. Hincks. We have not failed to observe the ninth reason of appeal in the Court of Error and Appeal, or the eighth reason here; but we have been unable to find that either of the answers to the bill takes any objection to it as insufficient in parties, nor does any such objection seem to have been taken at the hearing in the Court of Chancery, and we conceive that we ought not to treat the suit as defective.

"The decree deals with the appellant as an agent or a trustee who, while acting in the agency or trusteeship, acquired for himself by contract, without the knowledge of the persons for whom he was agent or trustee, an interest in the subject of the agency or trusteeship, and is accordingly incapable of retaining from them the benefit, if any, of the acquisition. And it has scarcely been denied in argument that if the appellant stood in the relation of agent or trustee towards the corporation or inhabitants of Toronto, the decree (subject to the point of Mr. Hall's absence) has charged the appellant rightly. The relation, however, was disputed; but as their Lordships think unnecessarily. He may not have been agent or trustee within the common meaning or popular acceptation of either term but he was substantially; he was so within the reach of every principle of equitable jurisprudence, adopted for the purpose of securing, so far as possible, the fidelity of those who are entrusted with the power of acting in the affairs of others. If the appellant, as to the matters subsisting in the year 1851 and 1852 respectively, between the corporation upon one hand and the contractors and railway company on the other, so far as the appellant had anything to do with them, was not negotiorum gestor, it seems difficult or impossible to say that any person ever was so. It is evident, we think, that as a member of the corporation and mayor he took part in those matters before and after the 6th day of the 24th June, 1852, to an extent more than sufficient to incapacitate him from dealing as he did with Mr. Hincks and the contractors, unless for his own loss, if there should be loss, and for the gain of the corporation, that is so say, of the inhabitants of Toronto, if there should be gain. The able counsel for the appellant did not suggest that in the case of a private man having occasion and desiring to raise money by issuing debentures payable as to the principal at a distant day, but with intermediate interest and employing an agent for the purpose, the agent could act in the matter, with regard to the debentures, analogously to the manner in which the appellant acted here, as to those in question, and retain the profit from his principal. The difference between the two cases appears to their Lordships accidental merely and immaterial. It was incumbent on the appellant, while the affair of the debentures was pending and unsettled, not to place himself voluntarily in a position in which, while retaining the office of mayor, he would have a private interest that might be opposed to the unbiassed performance of his official duty. But he did so. In all the steps on the part of the corporation connected with the debentures that took place between the 24th of June and the 2nd of November, 1852—and they were important—the appellant, so far as he acted—and he did act—in the character of a member of its governing body was a bias, by reason of his private interest; for in truth and effect, from a time preceding July, 1852, he stood as to the debentures in the position of the contractors.

"The defence has been also to a great extent rested on the alleged ground that the appellant did not give wrong advice to the governing body of the corporation, or exercise influence over it in the matter of the debentures; that the governing body would have acted exactly as it did if the appellant had not been a member of it; that the corporation took altogether a prudent and correct course, and has lost nothing; and that any person not connected with it might honestly, safely, and effectually have made the bargain with Mr. Hincks and the contractors which the appellant did make. Assuming the alleged facts thus stated to be stated accurately, we conceive that they make no difference. But in truth it is very far from clear that the city of Toronto has not suffered considerably from the opinion that the bill answers and evidence were such as to throw on him the burden of proof of the fact, if material, that there was no agreement or arrangement respecting the debentures between the appellant and the contractors, previously to the 28th of June, 1852; and we think that no such proof has been given; and that it is to be inferred from what is before us that the appellant had, if not before the 24th, at least before the 28th of June, 1852, ascertained what the contractors would do, and what he could do with them as to the debentures—in effect made himself sure of the contractors. Now, what were the appellant's sentiments on the subject in April and early in June, 1852? They appear from two letters of those dates (9th of April and 10th of June), written by him to Mr. Wilson (we believe a merchant in England).—They are pages 76 and 77 of the Appendix, and contain these passages:—

"A large amount of municipal debentures will have to be disposed of in England during the ensuing summer, to provide the needful for the construction of the Ontario, Simcoe, and Huron,' and the 'Toronto and Guelph' railways. Should such an agency as that referred to above not be established, an agent will have to be sent from Canada to negotiate those securities, or some company in London, wholly unacquainted with the nature of our debentures, will have to be employed. Should an agent be sent to England on behalf of the Toronto and Guelph Company, of which I am President, he will be directed to take advantage of your valuable assistance in the sale of the securities of the company.

"I am favoured with your letters of the 7th and 14th of May, and fully concur with you in opinion that it would be a decided advantage were you to pay a visit to this country, after having ascertained the information capitalists in England require, regarding the municipal securities of Canada. I should have submitted a proposition on this subject to the directors of the Toronto and Guelph railroad, had not the Canada Company, through their commissioner, Mr. Widder, who is himself a director of the railroad, volunteered to negotiate the debentures of the company free of charge. I may mention here, that the corporation of Toronto has agreed to and the Ontario, Simcoe and Huron Railway, to the extent of £35,000 currency; the debentures of the city will be issued to this amount as the work progresses, the issue not to commence until £100,000 have been expended on the road. I propose to make these debentures payable in London, and have them negotiated by an agent appointed by the corporation, and hand their value in cash to the railway company, and thus prevent the credit of the city being injured by entrusting the sale of its bonds to unskilful hands, or their being forced into the market by needy railway contractors.

"The security for the punctual payment of the interest and principal of Municipal Bonds, provided for by the Provincial Act under which they are issued, is so ample that no doubt can possibly be entertained regarding their validity: their perfect security being at once established, surely a favourable sale could be effected in the present state of the money market in London.

"I applied some time since, through the Bank of Upper Canada, to negotiate a loan for the city of Toronto to the amount of £50,000 sterling, to redeem debentures and small city notes now out, issued under an old Provincial Act, which did not provide a sinking fund for their redemption; the bank offered to guarantee the principal and interest, but nothing has yet been done in the matter, beyond a favourable letter from Messrs. Glyn, Halifax & Co., agents of the Bank of Upper Canada in England.

"I will forward, as soon as published, a statement of the city debt and revenue, and should my views be approved of by the city council, regarding the loan and the manner of negotiating city debentures for railway purposes, you will hear from me on the subject.

"These were the appellant's views before he had performed the journey to Quebec, announced as probable in his letter to Mr. Wilson of the 12th of June. But what that journey effected we know. It would after the 24th have interfered with the appellant's personal interest—have tended to break up the arrangement with Mr. Hincks, if the debentures had been issued to the contractors payable in England, and so the heavy discount saved; and we find that the by-law of the 28th of June, made in the appellant's presence and signed by him, expressly directs the debentures to be issued under it to be made payable in Canada. They were also, as we know, of very doubtful validity. But upon the delicate question whether the corporation should take such a step, the mayor was necessarily prevented by his private interest from giving an unbiased opinion.

"It is after securing the discount that, at a later period of the year 1852, the English plan is arranged. By means of the difference between the debentures upon that plan and the debentures on the plan of the preceding June, the gain in dispute has been made; and it would probably be wrong to assume that this was made merely at the expense of the contractors, but he nearer the truth to say, that it was made at the expense of the corporation (as trustees of the city) who would not have found it necessary to issue so many debentures on the English as on the Canadian plan.

"The secrecy and disingenuousness with which the appellant conducted himself do not improve his case, especially as, if he had on the 28th of June disclosed the true state of things to the council, its other members might have taken a different course from that in fact taken by them (a point as to which it can be scarcely necessary to refer, particularly to the evidence of Mr. Joshua Beard, Mr. Tully, and Mr. Samuel Thompson, in pages 25, 28 and 32 of the appendix.) But we do not say that had the appellant on the 28th of June made a full communication to the council, and nevertheless its members had acted as they did act, that would have prevented the success against him of a suit on behalf of the inhabitants, which in effect and substance this suit still is.

"It has been also argued that the governing body of the corporation was a deliberative body, and on that ground out of the operation of any civil rulers or principles applicable to agents and trustees; and the reported cases of Lord Petre and Lord Howden were mentioned, and it was said that members of the British legislature often vote in Parliament respecting matters in which they are personally interested, and do so without censure or risk. We are of opinion however, that neither the governing character nor the deliberative character of the corporation councils makes any difference, and that the Council was in effect and substance a body of trustees for the inhabitants of Toronto—trustees having a considerable extent of discretion and power, but having also duties to perform, and forbidden to act corruptly. With regard to members of a legislature, properly so called, who vote in support of their private interests, if that ever happens, there may possibly be insurmountable difficulties in the way of the practical application of many of the well known principles by courts of civil justice, which, however, are nevertheless bound to apply those principles where they can be applied. The common council of Toronto cannot in any proper sense of the term be deemed a legislative body; nor can it be so treated. The members are merely delegates in and of a provincial town for its local administration. For every purpose at present material, they must be held to be merely private persons having to perform duties, for the proper execution of which they are responsible to powers above them. We agree that the cases of Lord Petre and Lord Howden must at present be viewed as correct expositions of English law, but so viewed they do not, we conceive, affect the controversy before us.

"It has been argued too, that the bill in the cause puts the case against the appellant on the ground of loss to the corporation, and of direct fraud in the popular sense of that expression upon the appellant's part; that neither of these has been established, and that therefore the bill should have been dismissed. We consider, however, that though some allegations of the bill are very possibly incorrect, a sufficient portion of its statements to sustain the decree has been established, and that the argument in this respect is not even plausible, except as to costs; with regard to which, had the appellant's conduct been open and straightforward, their Lordships might have been disposed to relieve him; but his proceedings have been so much otherwise, they rendered so much grave suspicion reasonable, that their Lordships concur in the decree in point of costs as well as otherwise.

"Their Lordships, however, desire to be understood as not having intimated an opinion that if before December, 1852, the appellant had not entered into any agreement or arrangement concerning any of the debentures nor had any dealing in or with them, it would not have been competent to him in or after that month to deal for them with the contractors as any stranger might have done.

"The recommendation of the Committee to the Crown must be the dismissal of the appeal with costs.

"Appeal dismissed with costs."

It is stated that the faculties of the King were declining daily. The renewal of the power entrusted to the Prince of Prussia, was expected to extend to six, instead of three months.

MARKETS.

London Money Market continued very quiet and easy, but the Bank of England had made no alterations in its rate. Notice had been issued by the Bank, that advances would be made on Government securities during the shutting of the transfer books till the 14th April, at 3 per cent.

In the Stock Exchange loans were obtainable at 2 per cent.

The commercial payments falling due on the 4th were generally well met. The Bank of England returns for the week ending 3rd March shows a slight falling off in the bullion of £986.

The city article of the London Times reports a decided increase in the applications for money, at the Bank of England on the 5th, although the supply was apparently abundant. The Daily News reports a dull and newsy feeling on the Stock Exchange, and a decline during Friday or about a quarter per cent.

The Manchester market was steady—yarns rather higher.

Breadstuffs generally dull. Indian corn rather better. Flour nominal; medium sustainable Western 20s 6d to 22s; Ohio, via Montreal, 24s to 25s—via New Orleans, 28s for choice. Wheat—red rather firmer, at 6s to 6s 3d; white neglected, at 7s to 7s 6d. Corn in better demand at 6d to 1s dearer; mixed and yellow, 34s to 34s 3d; white, 35s.

Money easy; rates unchanged. Consols, 96¼ to 96¾ for money; 96¾ to 96¾ for account.

Liverpool, March 6.—Breadstuffs unchanged and little doing. No alterations in provisions.

Life Association of Scotland.—We have already given sufficient evidence in these columns of the interest we take in the success of well-established Life Assurance Companies in this country, and from time to time we have endeavored to direct due attention to the various advantages offered to policy-holders by each Company. Competition has, however, so keenly attended the increased rivalry, that of late years it has not been easy to discover amongst the privileges held forth by the Company anything different from, or so greatly exceeding those attainable from another, as to render it deserving of special notice. On looking, however, into the regulations of a Company recently established in this country—the Life Association of Scotland—we have been particularly struck with one privilege, enjoyed by policy-holders—hitherto, we believe, unthought—we allude to the regulations whereby policy holders after the expiry of the short term of five years, during which the ordinary premium shall alone have been paid, are entitled to adopt foreign residence or hazardous occupation, without restriction or extra charge. This, it appears to us, is a real privilege, and entitled to much consideration, especially in a Colony where the community is so generally of a migratory character. We are satisfied, from personal knowledge, that the restrictions hitherto imposed on assurances, by the exaction of a very heavy extra for permission to exceed the limits of residence, has very much retarded the general adoption of Life Assurance as a family provision. We presume the temporary restrictions by the Life Association has been imposed in order to obviate the possibility of an assurance being effected, the party having it in contemplation at the time, to remove to a more unhealthy district. This is but fair, as in such a case the extra which can at once be ascertained, should be paid; but to the great bulk of assurers the privilege is undoubtedly, as we have said, a very great one and well worthy the imitation of other offices. Entertaining this opinion, we have deemed the object worthy of special notice in our columns.—Montreal Argus.

Dear Sir,—On my return to Town yesterday, I learned that Mr. Brown, the senior member for Toronto, had in a speech of his delivered a few days before, charged the ministry with issuing £25,000 of Municipal Loan Fund Debentures, contrary to law, for the purpose of buying up the electors of the County.

A simple relation of the facts, which I give below, will show the utter absurdity of such a charge.

Some time in the month of September last, the Town of Peterborough—not the County—determined to subscribe for £30,000 stock in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway, to enable that Company to build a branch of their road to Peterboro'. Soon after the passing of the By-law, it was discovered that Municipal debentures were unsaleable, and that money must be obtained by some other means or the work stop. During incidentally heard that the Township of Wolfesd, had some 18 months before received £15,000 sterling, of Municipal Loan Fund Debentures, which they had not used, I at once made enquiry, and found they were willing to surrender them upon being relieved from all responsibility; to this proposition I agreed, provided the Government would consent to the change of security.

A By-law therefore was introduced into the Town Council of Peterboro', passed, and ratified by the people and the consent of the Government obtained for the exchange of security. The Municipality of Wolfesd in the meantime passed resolutions authorizing their Reeve to surrender the Debentures, and take up their By-law, which was done on the 20th of October, and on the same day the Debentures were handed over to me, it will thus be seen that the Government had no control over these Debentures, and really nothing to do in the matter except consenting to the exchange of security. As to the bonus paid by Peterborough, it should be remembered that at the time of the surrender of these debentures, the Municipality of Wolfesd were in arrears to the government for something more than £1000 sterling for interest, sinking fund, &c., &c., which they were not willing to lose.

I am, dear sir,
Your obd't servant,
W. S. CONGER.

Toronto, Thursday, March 18, 1858.

We have to notice an improvement in price in the principal articles of produce during the week, with an active demand, and in consequence of the bad roads, exceedingly light deliveries. Wheat and flour have been the principle articles brought in, and other articles purchased for local use are scarce and dear, with a prospect of still higher prices, unless supplies are brought in by traders from other markets. The rain and mild weather will effectually remove the frost from the ground, and unless frost again sets in to injure the fall wheat crop, we cannot but rejoice in the prospect of an early spring, and we hope farmers will hasten their deferred injunction to sow largely of spring crops, and have some other dependance beside fall wheat.

Flour—The flour market continues to present an improved aspect, and although the transactions are light, yet better prices than those previously current have been realized during the week. There is a little of any grade offering, and the roads, especially Yonge-street, are so bad that teaming it in is slow work. The demand is principally confined to superfine, favorite brands of which are worth nearly as much as the next higher grade. Last few sales are reported, but the following quotations may be regarded as correct:—Superfine, $4 10 @ $4 20; Fancy, $4 15 @ $4 25; and Extra $4 25 to $4 30 per barrel.

The following exhibit of the flour received, shipments and stock in store at this point up to Tuesday night last:—

Flour—In store last report, brls.	30,388
Received since	2,745
	32,133
Shipped	860
At present in store	31,273

Wheat.—The wheat market continues buoyant, with a brisk competition between buyers—keeping prices up to a high limit. For good to choice shipping 93c to $1 (4s 6d to 5s) has been paid pretty freely, and in some cases for the primest samples 5s 1d and 5s 2d has been realized. The average price for the week has been higher than that of any previous for the month past, which, in some measure, may be attributed to the improved sample brought in, but is likewise caused by the anxiety to procure wheat. The purchases for Montreal account are less heavy, and the greater part of this week's deliveries are intended for the Oglensburg and the New England people. Inferior for distilling purposes is not worth over 55c to 80c (3s 9d to 4s) per barrel.

Wheat—In store last report, bush.	65,728
Received since	19,160
	84,888
Shipped	1,940
At present in store	123,942

Spring Wheat is in good request both for shipment and for seed. Prices are better, being now named at 75c to 80c (3s 9d to 4s) per bushel.

Barley does not come in so freely. It is worth 40c to 42c (2s to 2s 2d) per bushel.

Oats continue to be scarce, and prices have again advanced, quotations being now regarded low at 32c to 33c (1s 7d to 1s 8d) per bushel.—On Tuesday, as high as 1s 9d was paid.

Peas are much enquired for, and prices have an upward tendency. They would sell freely at 50c to 55c (2s 6d to 2s 9d) and even 60c (3s) might be realized for good varieties per bushel. Rye is very quiet at 60c (3s) per bushel of 60 lbs.

Seed—There is still not much activity in the seed market. The current quotations paid to farmers are—Timothy, per 48 lbs, $1 50c to $2; Clover, per 100 lbs, $4 75 to $5.

Potatoes are not so plentiful, and prices tend upward. Sales of loads are reported at 30c to 40c (1s to 2s 0d). Some choice varieties have realized 50c (2s 6d) per bushel.

Apples are not so much in request except when retailed by the peck and bushel. Good varieties when sold in this way realize 75c to $1 ($3 to $4) per bushel. By the barrel, they will bring $2 50 to $3 75.

Pork—The market for dressed hogs is active, with very light supplies. Prices continue firm at our quotations, which are $5 to $6 50 per 100 lbs. for good pork.

Butter—Fresh is not plentiful, and choice is readily command 20c to 22c (1s to 1s 1d) per lb. Tub is not so plentiful, and the stock on hand is not of good description. No 1 is worth 13c to 15c (6d to 7d); No. 2 is hardly saleable at 8c to 10c (3d to 4d) per lb.

Poultry is more freely offered. Chickens are worth 45c to 50c (2s 3d to 2s 6d) per pair. Geese, 50c (2s 6d) each. Turkeys, 90c to $1 25 (4s 6d to 6s 3d) each, tax ruling rate being $1.

Cheese is unchanged. American is readily sold at $6 to $7 1 per 100 lbs.

Home cheese is more freely, and prices are now so high, ranging from 10c to 10c (5d to 6d) per pound.

Beef is not offered so freely. Slaughtered from farmers' droves. A sale of 26 to 30 at $5 50 for hind-quarters, and $3 50 for fore-quarters, per 100 lbs. Cattle are in very good demand, and fetched as high as 3½c per lb, the highest price for shippers.

Sheep are unchanged. They sell as fast as they come to hand. Calves are not in demand at $4 to $5 each.

Wool is worth 30c per lb. Skins of sheep are in better demand, and are again have to advance our quotations to 70c to 90c (3s 6d to 4s 6d) each, for fresh slaughtered. Beef hides are not very firm, at $4 per 100 lbs. Calf-skins 6d per lb.

PATENT

ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical fermentation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate, forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected AT FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR HONOURABLE HOUSE,—

In conformity with the Statute providing for the management of the Provincial Lunatic Asylum at Toronto, I have the honor of submitting to your Honourable House, the following Report of the state of the said Institution.

At the date of my last report to your Honorable House, (1st March, 1857,) the total number of patients in this Asylum was 428. During the twelve months which have since elapsed, 180 new patients have been admitted, making the total number under treatment, in the year, 594.

The discharges in the same period have been 89; the deaths have been 84; and the elopements 5; thus leaving in the institution at the present date 416; of whom 251 are women, and 215 are men. Of the above 180 patients now remaining in 69 are lodged in the University Branch Asylum, and 397 in the Chief Asylum.

The health of the Asylum has, with exception of a short period in the month of July, been satisfactory. At that time a quantity of imported potatoes affected with the Bora, can rot, was purchased for the use of the patients, and shortly after several cases of severe dysentery and other formidable diseases of the digestive organs evincing a marked typhoid type occurred. I ordered the residue of this poisonous diet-stock, amounting to about 125 bushels, to be buried. The health of the patients speedily returned to its wonted state.

The mortality for the year, (being 34 deaths in a total of 594 cases under treatment) has been equal to 5.72 per cent.

The average annual mortality in the County Asylums of England for the five years preceding 1857, is shewn by Parliamentary Returns to have been 11.27 per cent.

The Asylum building still remains incomplete, and the portion now existing is overcrowded to a dangerous extent. In April, 1855, the visiting Commissioners addressed a memorial to his Excellency the Governor General, praying for the grant of an appropriate sum of money for the erection of the wings of the Asylum, according to the original approved plans of the Architect, and in accordance with this request a grant of £25,000 was included in the Act of supplies for that year.

The Asylum is now still more crowded than it was at the above period, and the pressure for admission of new patients is much greater. Above 60 applications, from various parts of the Province, at present press for vacancies; several of these cases are temporarily provided for by incarceration in the County Gaols, and many of the remainder are perhaps less comfortably lodged, and less judiciously treated at home. Nor can the above number be regarded as indicating the full extent of the exigency of the Insane of western Canada, and many persons are deterred from making application, or unwisely procrastinate this step, under the impression that it is useless to ask for admission of additional patients into an Asylum already fully occupied. Mr. Tully, the present Architect of the Asylum, has estimated that the erection of the Asylum wings would cost £30,000; and I believe this gentleman's calculations are very reliable.

The accommodative capacity of the whole building was stated by the former architect, Mr. Howard, to be equal to the comfortable lodgment of rather more than 500 patients: and that portion of it now existing was designed to receive 364 patients. The addition of the wings would therefore double the present lodging capacity, and it must be obvious that by no other means could an equal augmentation of provision for the insane be procured for the same amount of money.

It has, however, been argued by some who appear not to have taken a comprehensive view of the subject, that it is inexpedient to complete this Asylum according to the original plans, because the establishment would thus be too large to be efficiently superintended by one Physician-in-Chief. It is asserted by those who urge this view that 250 patients are as large a number as should be placed in any one building, and that no Lunatic Asylum should be proje ed on a larger scale. But this Asylum has been projected on a larger scale, and it is now too late to correct the mistake, if such it has been. If 250 patients are the largest number which should be placed in one building, why are 397 now crowed into this half erected house?

Though the above opinion may be, in the main, correct, yet it is well known that many excellent institutions for the insane, both in the British Isles and Europe, have been founded on a much larger scale, and are now most efficiently conducted.

The Asylum at Utica, in the State of New York, accommodates about 460 patients, and is in size very nearly identical with the contemplated extent of the Toronto Asylum; whilst those of Edinburgh, Wakefield, Lancaster, Surrey, Hanwell, and Colney Hatch, in Great Britain, are all much larger, and it is questionable if any insane institutions in the world are better regulated, or have been found more successful.

An Asylum may be inconveniently large, but if it is complete, this is a trivial error in comparison with its opposite. Some of those who object to the extension of the Toronto Asylum on the grounds that it would contain too many lunatics for efficient supervision, or comfortable lodgment, yet quietly ignore the fact that it now contains almost 400, and that the Medical Superintendent has charge in all of 466, of whom 69 are in a house three miles distant from the chief Asylum; nor would, perhaps, much objection be urged by these persons were the aggregate to be raised to 500, or even 600. It is very difficult to grapple with this sort of philanthropic logic.

There could not be found an experienced Medical Superintendent who would assert that it is more difficult to manage 500 patients in a large and well arranged Asylum, than 400 in an imperfect one. The 397 lunatics now lodged in this half built Asylum certainly demand more care, and cause more anxiety, than 300 or 600 would do, were the wings of the building in existence.

Classification of the insane in an Asylum, is no less indispensable for their comfort and cure, than is classification of the sick in a general hospital. It would be unreasonable and inhuman to lodge in the same rooms in the latter, patients suffering under small pox, typhus fever, cholera, or hospital gangrene, with those afflicted with ordinary simple diseases.

Is it less unreasonable or inhuman to huddle together in an Asylum, devoid of the means of classification, a multitude of insane people, manifesting every imaginable form and degree of mental and moral alienation?

The large size of a Lunatic Asylum no more constitutes the difficulty of its government than does the large size of a steamboat, or a vessel of war; a vigilant and discreet commander will make his voyage safely, despite the bulk of his ship.

Even in our Common Schools, which are peopled with long refractory inmates than our Lunatic Asylums, the importance of classification is duly appreciated, and is generally provided for. The cultivation and improvement of the sound mind is certainly not a more difficult task than the cure of the diseased mind. If a school has been commenced on a large scale, and left unfinished until its existing class rooms have, from the increase of pupils, become overcrowded, would it be advisable to leave it unfinished, and oblige the tutors to locate in the same rooms various branches of science and learning? Would it be wise to waste time in discussing the question of enlargement, when one hundred new pupils were begging entrance?

If the Toronto Asylum has been based on too large a scale it is abandoned, and applied to some other purpose? To continue to the it as an insane hospital in its present incomplete state, and to erect forthwith as many hundreds as would fill it when complete, to certainly a thousand times more absurd and inhuman than to carry out the original design, which was not adopted without due consideration.

Asylums on a smaller scale are, nevertheless, provided with wings, in which are the wards for various classes of troublesome patients, as the violent, noisy, obscene and profane, filthy, epileptic, suicidal, dangerous, mischievous, &c., &c. Infirmaries for the sick are generally placed at the extremity, with open galleries of communication. The want of these in the Toronto Asylum will be awfully demonstrated on the first visitation of pestilence.

The troublesome patients in the Toronto Asylum would be found to constitute from one-third to two-fifths of the whole. The comfort of the remaining two-thirds or three-fifths, comprising the quiet and timid, the gentle and refined, the pious and orderly, the cleanly and fastidious, the trained and improved incurable, and the progressing convalescent, can not possibly be secured to the same extent as would be attainable were the building completed. If the complaints of our convalescents could be heard in Parliament, the Asylum would not long remain as it is.

There is a class of the insane who have hitherto been imperfectly represented in this Asylum, much to the discredit of our country, and to the mortification of our national pride. I allude to the victims of the maladr amongst our more opulent and respectable inhabitants. Surely it is derogatory to our British Provincial pretensions, that the friends of this class of the insane are constrained to present themselves as mendicants at the portals of the public institutions of our republican neighbours, praying for that decent and comfortable accommodation, which their own wealth has not provided, or the semi-barbarism of their own land has yet denied.

In the original plans of the Asylum several rooms are marked as designed for respectable paying patients with private attendants; but these rooms have never been occupied as contemplated, and they are now taken up, with numerous beds in each, for the lodgment of more humble patients.

There can be no reason why our Provincial Asylum should rank inferior to the State Asylum across the Lake, at Utica; or at least we should feel ashamed to admit the reason. It is a better constructed and a more handsome edifice, and if completed, it would not have any superior on this continent. And yet our Canadian aristocracy do not blush when they bear for admission of their afflicted relatives into the Asylum of a people whom they often affect to despise. But our meanness becomes truly disgraceful when it is considered that the majority of American Asylums have been founded by munificent private donations. It is much to be desired that we should exhibit a larger amount of consistency, and less national supercilliousness.

The number of applications for admission of lunatics into this Asylum, during the past twelve months, has been 278. Of these cases 180 have been admitted; of the remainder a number recovered at home, and consequently did not avail of vacancies when offered; and several were unfit subjects for admission.

The arrearage of cases on the register of applications, now unprovided for, is about 60, and the number is rapidly increasing. Last month (February) has brought to hand 6 applications.

Were the erection of the desired new wings to be proceeded with immediately, at least two years, or probably three, would be required for their completion. During the next twelve months it will be found impossible to admit more than 100 new patients; and, supposing the number of applications to reach no higher figure than in the past year, it is manifest that before the 1st of March, 1859, the arrearage will not fall much short of 250. Unless, therefore, some immediate provision is made for additional accommodation, the amount of distress suffered by the insane of the Province, and by their relatives, will be very great.

The experiment of the Branch Asylum, in the University building, has succeeded admirably. The patients lodged in this auxiliary institution are as comfortable as it is possible to render persons in their mental condition, and though I cannot state with certainty the comparative cost per head for maintenance in the branch, and in the chief Asylum, I doubt not that on economical grounds the result has been advantageous. I would, therefore, recommend the opening of an additional Branch Asylum in this city, or within a convenient distance, which is adequate to the lodgment of 150 or 200 of the quiet and long resident patients of this institution. By the adoption of this measure a great boon would speedily be conferred on a large number of afflicted individuals and families. The perpetuation of the Branch Asylums, and the completion of the Chief Asylum will be found alike indispensible, and it is my belief that in this way sufficient provision for the insane of Western Canada, for the next eight or ten years, will be best and most economically effected.

In this province, in consequence of the absence of local institutions for the support of the destitute, it is impossible to adopt the system of Asylum management pursued in the United States, under which the discharge of uncured lunatics, after a definite period of treatment, generally not exceeding two years, is required. Our Canadian Asylums must therefore contain a large proportion of long resident incurables.

It has been stated by Dr. Tuke, of the justly celebrated York retreat, that of every ten lunatics admitted into the Asylums of England, five were discharged cured; but of the five who recover, only two remain permanently sane. I do not think this calculation would be found correct in Canada. More than two fifths of our discharged patient remain permanently sane.

Assuming, therefore, that Dr. Tuke's figures are approximately applicable to Western Canada, and that the occurring cases of primary insanity are annually equal to 200, which is probably not an over estimate, it will follow that an increase of 100 new permanent asylum residents would annually be provided for, deducting however, a certain number for the decrease resulting from deaths, which will vary from five to eight per cent annually on the total number of mates.

Relapsing patients are not so likely as others to remain permanent residents. Recurrent insanity is generally temporarily curable. Of the 168 patients admitted in the past year, 18 had at former times been inmates of other asylums; only twenty-seven recurrent cases have therefore been presented in a total of 166; a proportion corroborated by Mr. Tuke's estimate.

The necessity of making further and large provision for the insane in this province is too obvious to require urgent enjoinment; and it will be very unsound economy to defer action until public dissatisfaction and popular outcry render its further procrastination impossible. Insanity, submitted at an early period to appropriate treatment, is found curable to a much larger extent than when it has become chronic. Four out of five neglected cases will certainly remain uncured; but almost an equal proportion promptly put under treatment in well ordered asylums will probably result in recovery.

The average period of Asylum residence of the latter class of patients is about nine months; whereas the average residence of the former is not less than six or eight years. Sound political economy and Christian benevolence are therefore both arrayed in support of the doctrine of abundant and timely provision for the treatment and care of the insane.

It appears to be the concurrent opinion of writers on insanity in the present day, both in Europe and America, that the malady is undergoing a constant and progressive increase. In this province it must, from the rapid increase of our population, and the want of correct data in former times, be impossible to form any reliable conclusion as to the past and present incidence of insanity.

Reflecting with due consideration, on the various contributive agencies, which every Asylum Superintendent is constrained to regard as tending to the developement of the disease, it is almost impossible to withhold the admission that it is yearly becoming more prevalent.

I cannot, however, in this place, overlook the fact, that the usually assigned causes of insanity, as set forth by the profession, in the statistical summaries of lunacies, in the institutions published at the time of admission can in sincerity deem all of every twenty, strictly legitimate.

Glancing into the Asylum Register, I find the following agencies assigned as the causes of insanity, during the last few years:—

Grief, love, loss of property, religious excitement, religious despair, family quarrels, jealousy fright, disappointed affections, excessive study, reading and fasting, intemperance, breach of promise of marriage, suppression of Menses, slander, want of employment, marriage, miscarriage, and bad treatment, spirit rapping, death of child, death of husband, death of wife, business difficulties, political excitement, disputed boundary, strong tea, eclipse of the Sun, religious controversy, inhalation of nitrous oxide gas—(in the case of a young man hereditarily insane, and whose brother was then an inmate of the Asylum.) reading religious books, tobacco, remorse of conscience, &c. &c.

Now, it may one of the preceding wide spread agencies may be regarded as adequate to the overthrow of reason, how many lunatics should this Province contain? Intemperance alone would people fifty Asylums as large as our present one. Jealous wives and husbands would probably fill thirty. Bad treatment of husbands would equal intemperance. Political excitement would tenant a madhouse in every county, and one of superior class and size in the metropolis. Religious controversy would send in half the clergy of this Province, and large detachments of their congregations. Tobacco and Slander would leave few in Canada at large. Excessive study, solar eclipses, love, inhalation of the laughing gas, and remorse of conscience, would probably make up but a small aggregate. In 1851 cases of lunacy, admitted by me into this Asylum, I have met with only one instance in which the last named agency was alleged as the cause of the insanity; and the patient had not been very wicked.

Religious excitement and religious despair, both come in for their full share of censure; and yet we meet with very few cases in which either can be regarded as purely causal.

Those who are already half insane, are strongly predisposed to the malady, are very likely to rush into the former, or to reason themselves into the latter. Both conditions of the mind are merely epiphenomena of insanity. The madness of religious excitement is generally found speedily curable; while that of religious despair often proves incurable, and its victims are very commonly suicidal.

The assignment of the foregoing catalogue of disturbing agencies as the efficient causes of insanity must be regarded by all those who are largely conversant with the malady, as almost totally erroneous, and in medical certificates, affording very little useful information.

On the other hand, we cannot question the efficiency of such agencies as the following:—

Gestation, Puerperal disorder, Over lactation Fevers resulting in cerebral lesion, Sun stroke, Intense cold to the head, Injuries of the skull, Apoplexy, Epilepsy, Parental intemperance, Masturbation, Scrofulous and syphilitic taint, Defective diet, &c., &c.

Underlying or interwoven with these, or other efficient causes of insanity, are to be detected evils in the existing state of society, and it is to be feared in the pernicious tendencies of modern education and the moral training of youth, which demand of the physician entrusted with the care of the insane more than a casual indication. Deplorable and multitudinous are the facts which, in at least one section of his sphere of observation, the reminiscences of the Superintendent of an Insane Asylum supply in demonstration of the calamitous results of the moral pestilence alluded to.

I could not possibly present a more truthful depiction of the mental dethronement and the physical and moral debasement characterising the cases of insanity which owe their birth to the evils referred to, than by quoting the following eloquent passages from a recent report of Dr. McFarland, of the Illinois State Hospital for the Insane:—

"The physical evils which attend the underlying cause of all this difficulty have in the meantime kept pace with the progress of mental dilapidation.

"The hair becomes dry and falls off; the eye becomes vacant and watery, and the lids are red and tumid; the countenance is pale and expressionless, the flesh wastes, the limbs hang loosely on the trunk, the muscles are flaccid, the skin loose and scurfy, the hands are purple and cold, and the palms exude a constant viscid sweat. Long periods of utter inaction are sometimes suddenly broken by spells of uncontrollable fury, spending themselves on the nearest object within reach. Finally, the wretched object becomes motionless and inert. He rises and sits down, eats and sleeps, only as he is prompted to such acts by others. We throw a veil over the close of the scene, which is often protracted long after the form of the man has less than even the instincts of the brute.

"It is unnecessary even to hint that the consequences exhibited had their cause in a secret evil lying far back of anything manifested to the closest observer. The corrupt family servant, the vicious school-fellow, the libidinous book or picture, or simply the unchecked working of a wanton imagination, has sown the small but fatal seed of ruin—has broken down the golden wall of youthful purity and let in vice in one of its most loathsome and destructive forms. It is a fact of deep and painful significance that this vice recruits its victims, not from the ranks of the naturally low and sensual, but from a class comparatively high in the social scale. Whence comes this? Is such an evil without remedy? If not, where shall the cure be found? The answer to these questions would carry us back to an examination of the influences which make our society what it is; it would bring us into the domain of the instructor of youth, and dangerously near that which the religious teacher claims as his own. If the briefest synopsis of a reply was attempted, it would go to show that there are certain elemental parts of the constitution of every healthy mind which demand some sort of outward expression, and that the error of the age consists in considering the kind of expression demanded as something to be suppressed, discouraged, or, at any rate, to be clipt, trained or dwarfed to a shape at which exuberant nature revolts. The crater of public expression is so thoroughly capped by the force of public opinion that secret vices gnaw and gender in the hidden recesses of the soul."

Dr. McFarland's metaphor of the goddess "public opinion" sitting as a pot-lid over the volcano of human honesty, truth and manhood, is certainly a picture of American society, more arresting than gratifying. The old lady must occasionally have much to do to preserve her equilibrium.

The following closing passage claims attention and will command general approbation:—

"So long as we have no national amusements whatever, so long as mirth and sport are considered exclusively as puerilities, so long as the college is without its gymnasiums and its traditional sports, and the school-house has no well-trodden play-ground, so long as man is an iron-bound and close-visetted dollar grinding automaton which bends every moment at some false shrine of morality or respectability, just so long will the wards of American institutions for the insane be thronged with such objects as we have described. If society will constantly wear its Sunday dress of enforced constraint, it must pay for the privilege in such coin as violated nature chooses to exact."

The treatment of insanity in almost all the Asylums now in existence has been reduced to a few simple principles of very easy comprehension.

Medicine is had recourse to as little as possible, and, when employed, it is administered for the relief of bodily ailments, and not for the cure of the mental malady. It might perhaps be truthfully affirmed that until we are able to dispense with medicinal remedies altogether, no positive advancement has been made in the remedies of the mind. Much more than probable then is the treatment of the insane at their own homes, more success than at present would be achieved, or, at any rate, less mischief done, were the physicians to repose less confidence in the efficiency of drugs, and to rely more on the ministrative powers of nature, aided by plentiful diet, appropriate beverages, pure air, moderate exercise, and uniform kindness and truth. Nothing irritates or injures the insane more than falsehood, and one of the greatest difficulties encountered in their management on admission into an Asylum, is that of inspiring them with reliance on our veracity—so often and so grossly have they been deceived by the silly and bootless modacitiy of all by whom they have previously been surrounded.

Unvarying kindness, never-tiring forbearance, and undeviating truthfulness, are the cardinal moral agencies now employed in every well-conducted Lunatic Asylum; and surely no remedies could be found less expensive, or more easy of appliance. The superintendent who does not find these the most potent curatives, and the most prolific contributors to his own ease and happiness, has certainly chosen a wrong position, and must rather himself require treatment than be qualified to administer it to others. Recourse to harshness in any form or degree must indicate not merely ill nature, but also the utter absence of common sense and correct information. To live among the insane is but to be irresistibly constrained to pity and to love them: and, when once this bond is established between the physician and his confiding family, the task of government becomes, so far as they are concerned, a labour of inconceivable pleasure.

But the superintendent of an insane asylum has other people to manage and to govern, besides his patients. Numerous servants and attendants under whose charge the insane are placed, demand his vigilant, keen and incessant supervision. The amount of mischief which even one scoundrel is capable of working in any large establishment, and the annoyance and perplexity such a character can contrive to give, can be understood only by those who have encountered the evil.

The Toronto Asylum has not enjoyed total exemption from troubles of this sort. I have, however, fearlessly and without favor exercised, as I purpose for the future to exercise towards all under my control, that authority which the law has vested in me as Medical Superintendent of this Asylum, and without which all salutary discipline would be but a delusion.

No man of sense in a position of heavy responsibility will dismiss a good servant,—none but a fool or a knave will retain a bad one.

No evil which can redound from the dismissal of a bad servant in public institutions, no slander which he may whisper or publish, can possibly be so dangerous as his retention. Such persons seldom fail to paint in dark colours the character of their late masters; and there is always to be met with in society a considerable number of people who feel a deep interest in their neighbours' faults, and find much comfort in making them largely known. An officer of this institution, not over-loaded with other work, has been in the habit of inquiring from servants leaving the establishment what have been the reasons for their departure? It would be very interesting and instructive to have a perusal of this gentleman's notes.

One half of all the patients who have eloped from the Asylum, during the past two years, have returned to it of their own accord, some after an absence of a few days, others of several months, and one after more than a year. Within the last year three women who had been patients under my predecessor, Dr. Scott, came to the Asylum and begged for re-admission.

Relapsing patients, who have ever before been inmates, re-enter with an air of confidence and returning quietude which shows that they felt at home. Visitors passing through our wards, frequent by request to be shown the worst patients: and when informed they are amongst them, they appear incredulous. They come to the house imbued with the most primitive ideas of the characteristics of insanity, and with the most barbaric notions of its treatment. It seems amazing to them that large numbers of mad people can be lodged together without destroying one another and all around them. The modern Asylum and its system of mild government would be practical impossibilities, were lunatics incapable of association. So long as the insane were regarded as malignant, bloodthirsty, treacherous, vindictive, and implacable, and their malady was ascribed to demoniac possession, they were indeed treated as the devil's children ought to be. But the devil has much less to do with the inmates of an insane hospital than those outside who are called sane. I believe there is no asylum superintendent who would not rather undertake the government of 500 lunatics, than 50 sane persons taken indiscriminately from society.

For the introduction of pictures into our wards we are indebted to that excellent lady, Miss D. L. Dix, whose efforts in behalf of the insane of this country, and in every nation in Europe, have earned for her a world-wide fame, and entitled her to the highest rank among modern philanthropists.

To the objects of attraction thus introduced, I have from time to time added colored engravings of superior character, together with some plaster statuary; and at the present time three wards exhibit a well diversified supply of these ornaments, while the others have inherited the less expensive early stock.

It is a gratifying fact, that in the course of three years but two instances have occurred of wilful injury to these ornaments. In one the offence was committed by a male patient in a fit of aberration, and in the other by a female in a state of lucid termagancy, which probably had been her normal condition at home.

Dr. Conolly, in his treatise "on the construction and government of Lunatic Asylums," makes the following remarks on the subject of ornament and decoration:

"Much ornament or decoration, external or internal, is useless, and rather offends irritable patients than gives any satisfaction to the more contented. In some of the Italian asylums, busts, pictures and ornaments abound, and the walls are painted with figures representing various allegories or histories. These would appear to me more likely to rouse morbid associations than to do any good.'

So much for theory unfounded on facts. The Italians are right, and Dr. Conolly is very far wrong. A visit to the Asylums of America would convince him that beautiful pictures and other works of art displayed in the apartments of the insane have a most benign influence on their troubled minds.

It is probable that the opulent citizens of Western Canada, whether from having read Dr. Conolly's book or otherwise, have adopted his opinion; not a single donation in the form of ornaments (nor, parenthetically recording the fact, in any other form,) has yet been made to this Asylum. It is unpleasant to state this fact; but truth can do no harm.

The religious services of the Asylum have, by the kind attention of the Ministers of various denominations of the City, been regularly continued, and the sick have generally received the visitorial consolation of their respective clergy.

I avail myself of this opportunity to return, on behalf of the people under my charge, thanks to the various proprietors of newspapers who have gratuitously continued to supply their publications to the Asylum. The following papers have been regularly received;

A large number of our patients manifest great interest in reading the news of the day, and, though some portion of the contents of our newspapers may be badly suited to their improvement, still the average benefit is considerable. If it were possible to obtain papers free from atrocious details of crime, police reports, and other foul matter, our insane readers would be much relieved, and probably the public would not be much injured by the change.

The laundry recently erected in the rear of the Asylum has much benefitted the institution. Its want was so long felt as to render its value now very appreciable.

In the past summer a considerable additional portion of the farm was tile-drained, without any expense beyond the cost of material.

The quantity of land available for cultivation is inadequate to the wants and labour capability of the Asylum. A triangular piece of land, belonging now to the Province, lies immediately west of the farm, in a waste state, and might be leased to the Asylum, resumable by Government at any time. It would be rendered more valuable by cultivation, and its products would be very useful to this institution.

The Escape of the "Adriatic."

HER VOYAGE ACROSS THE ATLANTIC—INTERESTING NARRATIVE—HER SAFE ARRIVAL AT SAVANNAH

(From the Savannah Republican, March 19.)

The American Bark Adriatic, which became famous from her disastrous collision with the French steamer Lyonnais, in November, 1856, and still more an object of interest from her recent seizures by the French authorities at Marseilles, her confiscation by the Court of Admiralty, and her subsequent escape arrived safely at this port at an early hour yesterday. We have had a long interview with her commander, Captain Durham, and as the facts connected with her escape are matters of national interest, we proceed to state them as briefly as the nature of the subject will allow.

The circumstances attending the collision with the Lyonnais are already familiar to the public. Capt. Durham is very positive that it grew out of no fault on the part of his own vessel, but re-called, as he alleges, from the culpable mismanagement by the officers of the steamer. The judgement of confiscation was rendered by the Imperial Court of Aix, in December last, and as soon as a copy was served on Capt. Durham, believing that it was impossible, in the excited state of the public mind in France, to obtain justice, he resolved to make his escape if possible, and place the whole matter in the hands of his government. Of course he had to resort to stratagem to accomplish his purpose. Learning that the Adriatic would not be taken possession of until the full extent of loss by the Lyonnais could be ascertained, he improved the interval in devising the means of escape. He engaged a caulker, and had her caulked all around for about five feet above the water's edge, under pretext that she was so open when the mistrals should set in, she would sink right there in the harbour. Capt. D. thinks there was no suspicions from this movement, for in the "noise and confusion" of the caulker's operations, he and an assistant were quietly receiving the running rigging on board and getting ready for sea. They worked at this business about three hours every night, say from 9 o'clock till 1., when there was much noise and it was so dark no one could either hear nor see what they were doing. Their provisions they got on board another vessel, and from thence transferred to the Adriatic during the night.—The crew was also shipped for another vessel and subsequently taken on board the Adriatic when they were so much intoxicated as not to be conscious of what was going on.

Captain Durham commenced getting ready to haul out about nine o'clock on the evening of the 8th of January, his forces consisting, besides himself, of Capt. ——, the two mates and a boy. The vessel lay in the middle tier, about half way up the harbour, with both anchors ahead, and moored with a hawser astern. They cut the two topsails and main topmast staysail where she lay. The vessel ahead of the Adriatic was made fast to the chain, and when the Adriatic slipped they let go the fast of the other vessel and hove her right in the middle of the harbour ahead of her. When the captain awoke and found out his situation and that his vessel was adrift, there was no end to his imprecations against "the d——d Yankees." Capt. D. had no time to spare to his "sacres," but got clear of him as soon as he could and hauled down the harbour nearly to the guardship, when he stopped to take on his crew and to make sail. The crew were got on board by four o'clock on the morning of the 9th; they then set the topsails, and putting four oars in the boat put her ahead until the vessel got steerage way.

When the Adriatic got abreast of the guardship, her boat came off and demanded the fort pass of the former. Capt. D. when asked for his pass, replied "presnez garde la," and threw the officer a small bit of paper with two sous wrapped up in it. The paper and money, however—whether by accident or design the captain does not say—went over the boat and into the water, sinking to the bottom. The officer of the guardship then enquired for the name of the vessel, when Capt. D. sung out that she was the American ship Lana that had cleared the day before. Nothing more was heard from the official, and the Adriatic proceeded on her way.

As soon as the fugitive got clear of the harbour, a fine breeze sprung up from the eastward and at daybreak she was abreast of Planier, and three good miles off the French coast. The Adriatic then took her course for Spezzia, in Sardinia, the captain expecting to find his ship's papers there, and also some American men-of-war, who might supply him with an anchor and such other articles as he stood in need of. She arrived at Spezzia on the morning of the 19th of January and anchored with the kedge, having cut loose both anchors and left them at the wharf in Marseilles. There was no man-of-war in port, and her papers had not arrived. Having no bill of health, the Sardinian authorities would not permit her to land. Capt. D. then went ashore himself, to the prefects office, where he met the American consul, who informed him that intelligence of his escape had reached there and that the French government had telegraphed to all the ports of the Mediterranean to stop the vessel in whatever port she might be found.—Soon after her arrival orders came from Turin to seize the vessel, and the officers actually placed a guard under her stern, with two guns mounted, having received orders to fire should any attempt be made by the captain of the Adriatic to move from the spot. The next orders received were that the vessel should not be molested, but that none of her men went to the shore or communication with the shore, nor allow anything to be sent on board of her, not even water, nor any other kind of assistance whatever.

On a few days, more favorable, all these restrictions were removed, and the vessel was supplied with water, provisions, &c., and on the 26th of January she sailed for Savannah, where she arrived safely on the 19th inst., after a passage of 52 days. Capt. D. has on board the ship's papers, and will proceed to Washington to pay for, which was duly done.

Col. Long, the United States storekeeper at Spezzia, kindly furnished the vessel with all she wanted. Just as she got her provisions and water on board, there came a fresh breeze from the northward, and the vessel was riding by the hedge and forty fathoms of chain, with one of the chain boats filled with stones to back it, and a hauser bent to the chain box. She lay then in what is called Penagallia Bay, with the wind blowing right on shore.

About two o'clock the vessel commenced dragging; all hands went to work and got sail on as soon as possible—cutting away one chain box, and dragging the other by the point, which she neared so closely that one might have jumped ashore from the deck. The vessel kept drifting until Capt. D. was compelled to run a hauser ashore to the lazaretto, where he made out to hold her until he

The North-West Exploring Expedition.

REPORT OF MR. HIND.

To the Hon. T. J. J. Loranger, M. P. P., Provincial Secretary:—

SIR,—I have the honor to submit a final Report on my department of the Canadian Red River Exploring Expedition.

In a letter addressed to your predecessor, the Hon T. L. Terrill, M. P. P., dated St. Paul, Minnesota Territory, Oct. 28, 1857, I furnished a general scheme of a Report comprising some topics not mentioned in my instructions.

On returning to Toronto, I waited upon the Hon. Mr Terrill, who, with reference to the general plan of this Report, expressed his concurrence and approval.

The introductory chapter contains an outline of its contents as well as the general results of what is therein illustrated and expressed in detail.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

HENRY YOULE HIND, M. A.,

Toronto, Feb. 6, 1858.

The exploration of the route between Fort William, Lake Superior, and Fort Garry, Red River, having been made in canoes, the description of the line of communication between those distant points necessarily refers to the available water facilities which were found to exist, so that in the following sketches of the topography of the country bordering the route, only as much is described as was actually visible from river or lake, when in canoe, or from the summit of hills which were ascended at the different portages and camping places whenever opportunity offered. At the most, therefore, a very narrow strip of country is comprehended in succeeding delineations, but from the nature of the region through which the strip runs, it is highly probable that it represents the general character of a very large portion of the area between the valley of Lakes Winnipeg and Winnipeg, as far as he Lake of the Woods), and the right bank of the Winnipeg river.

The speed at which we were obliged to travel in order to accomplish our voyage within a stated time, very considerably lessened the number of opportunities which might otherwise have been offered, for acquiring more ample knowledge of many parts of the country looking fair to reward a minute exploration. The distance between Fort William and Fort Garry is about 603 miles, and the time occupied in traversing this great extent of country was thirty-three days, including a stoppage of two days and a half at Fort Frances, one day at Garden Island, and two days at Islington Mission, Winnipeg River; so that the time actually spent in canoe was twenty-seven and a half days, which gives an average of 27½ miles a day. This average refers solely to the different canoes I occupied at the several stages of the voyage, which were in order, a five fathom north canoe with the main party, from Fort William to Fort France, a distance of 393 miles; a small canoe carrying three persons, in company with Mr. Dawson, simultaneously equipped from Fort Frances to Islington Mission, 190 miles; and a small canoe, alone, from the Mission to the Stone Fort, Red River, a distance of 17 miles. The average daily progress being in the large canoe 20 miles and in the small canoe 47 miles. But the average daily progress of the large canoes along the whole route was 25 miles.

The valley of the Kaministiquia below the Grand Falls, contains an area of good land probably exceeding 20,000 acres. It will doubtless acquire much importance as a terminus of any line of communication, whether by boats or Winter road, which may eventually be established between the valleys of lakes Superior and Winnipeg.

From the precedence of shoal water for a long distance in the Kaministiquia and the great length of the portages at the height of land, it may not happen that this route will ever be selected for improvement as a boat communication, but from the considerations which will soon be noticed, Fort William and the valley in which it is situated may become under any circumstances points of special interest. Arrow Lake, on the Pigeon River route, formerly pursued by the North West Company, is within a mile and a half of Lac la Croix, within 60 miles of Point des Mourons on the Kaministiquia, as shown on the map.

Between the Grand Falls of the Kaministiquia and Fort Frances, a distance of 275 miles, very few areas of cultivable land occur on the water communication; but it is probable that many areas of limited extent might be found, if sought for, on the shores of the lakes and on the banks of the rivers.

The country as a whole must be regarded as a sterile waste, offering no inducements for settlement beyond those which a mining interest might foster, or small village stations on a line of communication.

The valley of Rainy River is by far the most important tract seen, and I do not think that the estimate of 320,000 acres of good land assigned to the British side in this Report, is too much.

The islands in the Lake of the Woods, offer some spots available for cultivation, many of which are now occupied by Indians, who cultivate Indian corn, potatoes, squashes and pumpkins.

The Winnipeg River until within a few miles of its mouth, flows through a desolate and irreclaimable rocky waste, furnishing a very small supply of timber for lumbering purposes in proportion to its length of 163 miles.

Small patches varying from 50 to 300 acres of excellent drift clay, occur at and below the Islington Mission, but within a few miles of the mouth of the river an extensive area of good arable land is to be found.

These areas, both large and small, will possess only a limited importance; the country through which the Winnipeg flows, the character of the river, with its rapids and cascades, having a fall of 333 feet, altogether preclude the hope of its being made available as a permanent means of communication with the valley of Lake Winnipeg.

The distance from the north-west corner of the Lake of the Woods to Fort Garry cannot exceed one hundred miles, while by the Winnipeg the distance from the same point is 282 miles. Whatever may be the result of Mr. Dawson's exploration of the route between those points, it is very probable that as a station on a Winter route, the north-west corner of the Lake of the Woods will occupy a very prominent position.

Of the valley of Red River I find it impossible to speak in any other terms than those which may express astonishment and admiration.

The descriptions which I had read previous to my arrival there, certainly did not in any way prepare me for the magnificent country at present occupied and controlled by those whose interests, no one seeks to deny, have been necessarily opposed to settlement, or communication with what may be termed the outer world.

I entirely concur in the brief but expressive description given to me by an English settler on the Assininiboine, that the Red River including a large portion belonging to its great affluent, is a "paradise of fertility."

During my visit to Assininiboia, a District embracing the settlements on both Rivers, I paid particular attention to the objections which have been urged against the climate and soil of the country with reference to agricultural operations, and I have no hesitation in saying that erroneous impressions respecting the available area of cultivable land, the soil, the crops and the climate still exist and find publicity.

I do not wish it to be understood that these descriptive errors result from a determination to misrepresent facts, but they arise either from unconsciousness of the true nature of existing physical impediments to settlement, or an indisposition to explain how those impediments were produced or may be remedied.

I was frequently referred to the "Big Swamp" as forming an insurmountable barrier to the rearward progress of settlement from Red River. This "Big Swamp" I found to be maintained by a mill dam at its chief outlet, and while reference was constantly made to the evil, the cause which produced it was ignored, or really unknown.

In suggesting to residents at Red River the, drainage of the "Big Swamp," two objections were urged, the first that its height above the river would not admit of drainage; the second that if drained it would require expensive bridges to be erected over the gullies which would soon be formed by its waters seeking their outlet to Red River.

The first objection was soon answered by my assistant Mr. John Fleming, who ascertained instrumentally, the relative heights of the Big Swamp, the Prairie and Red River at the middle Settlement.

He found the elevation of the swamp to be 27 feet above the river level. Section No. 6, shows these relations; and I may here remark, that so far as my observations enabled me to form an opinion, all other swamps on the Assiniboine, or on Red River may with equal ease be drained.

The second objection proceeded from a brother Factor of the Honorable Hudson's Bay Company, and a member of the Board of Public Works, and the Settlement.

He admitted the proof, but stated that the gullies formed in the yielding clay of the Prairie would require expensive bridges to make them passable for settlers, the cost of which might amount to two or three hundred pounds.

I have no doubt that the swamps on the east side of the river would be as easily drained as the one to which I have referred as length.

The origin of these swamps is, I think, simply explained in the following way. Red River occupies a trench which is has cut for itself about 30 feet below the level of the beautiful prairie through which it flows. Its banks are fringed with heavy timber for a depth of perhaps a quarter of a mile on one side or the other, and during the lapse of many years, occasional overflows have silted up the wooden banks for perhaps a foot above the level of the prairies: so that in some places the river flows between banks which are a little higher than the prairies beyond them. When, therefore, a great flood occurs, as in 1-25, in 1852, the prairie are flooded, and the low natural levee, on the immediate bank, prevents the return of the waters to the bed of the river, and forms a "Swamp."

It is to be well observed that the "Big Swamp" did not assume its present formidable dimensions until after the flood of 1852—and the construction of the mill dam at Mill Creek now effectually prevents it from drying up, and restoring many thousands acres of admirable pasture land to the public grazing grounds of Red River.

I mentioned this impediment to the drainage of the "Big Swamp" to the owner of the mill, who is one of the most wealthy and influential, but he did not think the removal of the dam would assist in draining the Swamp, "it was too big."

The summer climate of this region appears to be very well adapted for agricultural operations.

The summer temperature is nearly 4 degrees warmer than at Toronto, as ascertained by a comparison of corresponding observations.

Indian corn, if properly cultivated and an early variety selected may always be relied on.

The melon grows with the utmost luxuriance without any artificial aid, and ripens perfectly before the end of August.

And yet with these natural and most truthful registers of climate, we are accustomed to hear of late spring and early autumn frosts, deplored, lamented, and held up as one of the great drawbacks of Red River

The opinions expressed at the settlement by different individuals, on the soil, climate and natural productions of the country, are often of a very opposite character; and I found invariably, that descriptions and opinions were remarkably affected by the relation which the individual bore to the Honourable Hudson's Bay Company.

In making these statements I do not wish it to be supposed that any attempt was ever made, intentionally to mislead, but the habit of describing everything not connected with the Fur Trade, appeared to have become a second nature to many of the old residents whose interests are locked up in it.

All kinds of farm produce, common in Canada, succeed admirably in the district of the Assiniboia; three are wheat, oats, barley, Indian corn, hops, flax, hemp, potatoes, root crops, and all kinds of common garden vegetables.

The potatoes, cauliflowers and onions, I have not seen surpassed at any of our Provincial Fairs; an enumeration of the weight of some of these productions of the garden and farm will be found in the text, and numerous specimens accompany this Report.

The character of the soil in Assiniboia within the limits of the ancient Lake Ridges, cannot be surpassed. It is a rich black mould 10 to 20 inches deep, resting on a lightish coloured alluvial clay about 4 feet deep, which again rests upon lacustrine or drift clay to the level of the water, in all the rivers and creeks inspected.

I frequently examined the soil some miles distant from the rivers, along my line of route, as shown on the map, and I invariably found the prairie portion to exhibit a uniform fertility.

The area occupied by the fertile prairies I visited and saw certainly exceeds 1,500,000 acres—and no will appear from an inspection of the map of Minnesota, the greater portion of the remainder available prairie land in the valleys of Red River lies within British Territory, while the valley of the Assiniboine is wholly within it

The altitude of the valley of Red River above the sea is about 840 feet, or 320 feet less than the elevation given to it by high authority, and from which erroneous conclusions respecting its climate in relation to agriculture, have been drawn.

As an agricultural country I have no hesitation in expressing the strongest conviction that it will one day rank among the most distinguished.

The present state of society and the condition of the people in the settlements is far from being a pleasing or encouraging subject.

The European and Canadian element have been gradually diminishing for years; and the Half-breed population is apparently drawing closer to the habits and castes of their Indian ancestry.

That Agriculture and all the simpler Arts have been discouraged is but too apparent.

The interests of the Fur Trade are necessarily opposed to the centralization and settlement of the Half-breed and Indian Hunters, and it is everywhere seen that those interests have been upheld at a great sacrifice of means, and by the practice of a far-seeing and skilful policy.

Red River has been settled for 40 years, and now contains a population of about 7,000 souls, yet no single branch of industry, common even in the thinly settled part of Canada, is practiced there.

Whatever efforts were made in time past, and there have been many, they have terminated in failure, and it is difficult to resist the impression that these failures were designed by some in authority.

Such artifices appear to have been thought necessary when the controlling authorities were weak, and indeed almost powerless in the face of a strong but irresolute and uneducated people.

The valley of Red River is capable of supplying all the great necessities of life with the exception of iron for some years to come. The most important want is fuel, but there is much probability that on the upper Assiniboine and the Little Souris river, one of its affluents, Tertiary coal or lignite, will be found in available quantities.

The whole question of a boat communication between Fort William and Red River will be fully discussed in the reports of my colleagues, but having enjoyed the opportunity of seeing the country between Crow Wing in the State of Minnesota, and the settlements at Red River, upon throughout the year, I may perhaps venture to introduce a few remarks with reference to a winter road on British territory.

It is well known that many years since the Honorable Hudson's Bay Company commenced to cut a Winter road between Red River and York Factory, Hudson's Bay, a distance perhaps of 600 miles, with a view to admit of the transport of articles of export during the long Winter months. The project, however, was abandoned, but the idea still remains strong in the minds of some of the settlers at Red River.

A Winter road from Fort Garry to the Lake of the Woods would not exceed 100 miles; it is a route which is often travelled in the Winter, and the cattle at Fort Frances were brought that way. Once on the Lake of the Woods, the road is open for 170 miles, requiring only two or three detours into the forest to escape that portion of Rainy River which never freezes. The other detours from lake or river would necessarily be at the Portages along the line of boat route, or near them.

The recommendation which a Winter road in conjunction with a summer boat communication enjoys, is that the poor or floating population of Red River would easily be induced to settle at the different posts on the route, which would be necessary at stated intervals, with a view to accumulate supplies of provisions, hay, &c., during the summer months. It would be merely transferring their rude industry from the open prairies, where they are often compelled to live in misery during the winter, to a settled village life, which might soon become self-supporting, and continually assist in improving the means of communication.

The following tables show the respective lengths of different Routes traversed or which might be suggested between Lake Superior and Fort Garry, Red River:

I. The Canoe Route followed by the Expedition from Fort William to Fort Garry, about..... 590 miles.

II. Canoe Route from Fort William via Miles Lake to North-West corner of Lake of the Woods..... 431 "

Total..... 531 "

III. Road from Point des Mourons 10 miles from Fort William, to Gun Flint Lake on the Pigeon River Route in an air line..... 80 "

Total..... 374 "

IV. Winter Road side by side with the last named route..... 494 "

V. Point des Mourons to Gun-Flint Lake on Pigeon River route... 58 "

Boat route via the Winnipeg to Fort Garry in the event of a Summer Road not being at present practicable from Fort Garry to the North-West corner, Lake of the Woods... 564 "

VI. Route from Fort Garry to St. Paul, Minnesota..... 530 "

The country between Point des Mourons and Arrow Lake, or Gun-Flint Lake, or even Lake Saginagah on the Pigeon River route, acquires great interest when viewed in connection with the facilities which already exist at Red River for supplying without delay the materiel required to establish a boat communication on that route.

The Private Freighters of the settlement could, and no doubt would despatch their boats of four or five tons, fully equipped and appointed to Gun-Flint Lake (Fort de Terre) or if it presented sensible remunerations were guaranteed. The only point of great difficulty appears to lie in the communication between Point des Mourons and Gun-Flint Lakes; or perhaps even Arrow Lake, only 3½ miles in an air line from that of the valley of Kaministiquia. But little reliable information is accessible concerning this tract of country.

The experience possessed, when assisted by the means at the disposal of the Private Freighters of Red River, may render their services very valuable auxiliaries in opening a line of communication without much present outlay. Their employment might be regarded as a necessary preliminary step towards establishing a permanent commercial connexion between Canada and the valley of Red River.

In continuation, it affords me great pleasure to have this opportunity of expressing sincere thanks to my Assistant, John Fleming, whose zeal and industry have never for a moment flagged from the day of our departure to the present hour.

In addition to the duties to which I referred in my report from Fort Frances, Mr. Fleming levelled across the valley of Red River from the "Big Swamp" to the Lake Ridge, when I was engaged on the Assiniboine; and all the views and sketches of Forts, Cascades, Rapids, Portages, Churches and implements, are from Mr. Fleming's pencil.

Letter to the Honorable T. J. J. Loranger, M. P. P., Provincial Secretary, on some results of the Canadian Red River Exploring Expedition.

SIR,—In compliance with your request that I should furnish you with a plain and concise summary of the results recorded and views expressed in my Report on the Red River Exploring Expedition, I have the honor to submit the following in relation to—

1st. The Means of Communication and Transport between Lake Superior and Red River.

2nd. The Areas of Cultivatable Land on the Route.

3rd. The Main Geological Features of the Country.

4th. The character of Red River Valley as an Agricultural Country.

5th. The Climate.

6th. The Present Condition of its Inhabitants.

7th. The importance of Red River.

I. Means of Communication.—The most advantageous Routes between Fort William, Lake Superior and Fort Garry, Red River, appear to be the following:

1. From Point des Mourons, near Fort William, to Gun-Flint Lake, on the Pigeon River Route, by road, about.....	60	miles.
Gun-Flint Lake to Fort Garry, by the Red River Freighter's boats of 4 to 5 tons.....	564	"
Total.....	624	"
2. Fort William to Gun Flint Lake by road.....	60	"
Gun-Flint Lake to the North-West corner of the Lake of the Woods, by Freighters boats.....	236	"
Road from the North-West corner of the Woods to Fort Garry...	100	"
Total.....	456	"

3. A Winter Road side by side with the last Route ..... 456 "

II. Areas of Arable Land:

1. Valley of the Kaministiquia, at the Lake Superior Terminus, about 20,000 acres.

2. Small detached areas, from 50 to 300 acres, on the south between the Kaministiquia and Rainy River.

3. Rainy River Valley exceeding 20,000 acres.

4. Detached areas on the Winnipeg, varying from 50 to 300 acres, until near the mouth of the river, where 20,000 acres may be found available.

5. The area of cultivable land of the first quality in the valley of Red River and its affluent the Assininiboine, within the British Territory, exceeds one million two hundred thousand acres. This does not include the Upper Assiniboine or its affluents. The area well adapted for grazing purposes in the same valley exceeds 3,000,000 acres.

III. The Geological Features.—The Primary Unfossiliferous rocks, consisting chiefly of Gneiss, Micaceous Schists, and Chlorite Schists, with intrusive Granite and Syenite, occupy the country, and are nearly everywhere exposed between Kakabeka Falls, 30 miles from Fort William, and Fort Frances, Rainy River, a distance of 270 miles. Drift clays, capped by alluvial deposits, occur for 70 miles on Rainy River, holding boulders and unworn fragments of limestone. From the sources of the Winnipeg to near its mouth, a vast area of Granite, followed by the unfossiliferous rocks before mentioned, occurs. This region may be considered hopelessly barren, with the exception of the small areas of Drift before noticed. Limestone of Silurian age appears on Red River, and probably underlies the greater part of its valley. It affords abundant and excellent building materials.

No promising indicates of metalliferous rocks are known to occur on the route, except at Gunflint Lake and Iron Lake, on the Pigeon River route. Salt exists in great abundance on Manitoba lake, near lake Winnipeg. Tertiary coal (Lignite) containing about 6 per cent of ash, is reported to exist in abundance on the Little Souris and the Assininiboine River, not 200 miles from the settlements on Red River.

IV. Valley of Red River as an Agricultural Country.—Enjoys a vast area of remarkably fertile, deep and permanent arable soil. All crops cultivated in Canada succeed well, and often show an average yield far in excess of Canadian returns. All necessaries of life, with the exception of iron and fuel, are found in great abundance in Red River Valley. The probable existance of Tertiary coal, or Lignite, is noticed above.

V. Climate.—The climate of the agricultural season is well adapted for all the operations of Husbandry. Corresponding observations show that the Summer temperature is three or four degrees warmer than at Toronto. The winter climate is very severe.

VI. The present condition of the inhabitants of Red River Valley.—The majority of the people are gradually becoming poorer, and approaching nearer to the Indian state; a result which seems to spring from the hitherto almost hopeless circumstances under which Husbandry has been conducted, and a quiet, unostentatious suppression, chiefly by means of competition through importations of every kind of Industry, which might lead to a selection of permanent homes by the half-breed and Indian Hunters. The better class of people are looking with much anxiety to some amelioration in their condition, and to remuneration for home industry, irrespective of the Fur Trade. The male population is fast diminishing, the European and Canadian element more particularly; enterprising young men seek their fortunes in the United States. Trade with the United States has lately acquired a growing importance. Red River cattle and horses are there exchanged for goods of different kinds. As a grazing country, Red River has, perhaps, no equal during summer and autumn, yet sheep are fast diminishing in numbers, wool being comparatively worthless in consequence of the general absence of even the simplest household machinery for the manufacture of "home-spun."

Through the munificence of the Home Missionary Societies, the interests of Religion and Education are well sustained amongst the affident population.

VII. The importance of Red River.—By far the larger portion of the valley of Red River available for extensive Agricultural Industry lies within British Territory. The region drained by the Upper Assiniboine has been shown to be incapable of supporting a large population, and the progress of settlement in the United States will soon begin to flow northwards, from the valley of the Mississippi to that of the Red River. But Red River unwaters a comparatively insignificant portion of the vast area tributary to Lake Winnipeg. The region spreads over 400,000 square miles; it is intersected by magnificent, navigable rivers; and is represented on good authority, to be fertile in soil and rich in mineral wealth. Red River is the key to this Great Valley, with it by means of a Winter road, following the route of a summer boat communication, Canadians can scarcely fail to establish a permanent junction, and prepare the way for the more speedy and ample resources of communication which will probably soon be required.

I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

HENRY YOULE HIND.

Incidents in the Capture of Canton.

"During the bombardment of the city the detrimental manner in which the unwashed hotbed and gaol fever have been raised requires no comment. Occasionally a rocket would take a lower range than was intended, and sweep half a dozen of them into eternity at a rush. The street, which runs from Davis's Column, on a bee line to the East Gate, is crowded all day with beggars, blind women, and children. Colonel Graham had his head quarters at the first shop within the gate, and as we passed was as dusty as a miller, sitting, with his own hands, to clear the place of a lot of rice, a quantity of which he was humanely doling out to the starving crowd outside. An old man calling himself elder his whole Mandah, refuses to vacate the temple below the Sanaim-seeing (head-quarters). He is seventy years of age he says, and so long as he can obtain a little rice, tobacco, and tea, there he shall remain. He was told that as the Marines were going to leave, he might not find the incomers (the Royal Artillery) so accommodating as they were, to which he replied he did not care. Three of his children, fellow residents he meant, he had been killed during the bombardment, but he did not fear.

THE CANTON FORTS.—Lord Elgin and Baron Gros came up to camp, and sat on the roof of Magazine-hill, to see the forts blow up. It was worth the trouble of getting up the hill to see the sight. When the spectators took their seats the forts were full of men. The French, who, having no engineers of their own, were directed by Certain Smart, took 12 rejected forts and Gough's fort was named by the commanding officer, Captain Munn. When the appointed time had come and passed, a rocket went up, the men hurried out, and the solid stone buildings stood intact in their loneliness. They never looked so interesting as during the few minutes which succeeded the rocket's. Seated not only 500 yards distance, you could see just a small glimmering slow match burning down. Then arose a succession of loud, sharp, cracking, shivering explosions, throwing fragments high in the air, and frightening, but not killing, a kite at the moment hovering over Fort Gough. There were at least twenty successive explosions at the larger fort When the smoke cleared a thousand eyes seemed to have passed in a few seconds. The square, substantial fortification was a picturesque ruin, such as we see at Carnarvon or Drachenfels. It was intended that the two forts should go together, but the French were ready first, and the spectators were tired of waiting, so the drum was divided into two parts—Times Correspondent.

ESCALADE OF THE WALLS OF CANTON.—Twenty minutes before the appointed time, the French advanced, and of course the English could not be kept back. They had crossed the ditch, and were clustered under the wall before the scaling ladders could be brought up. A daredevil young Frenchman had taken off his shoes and gaiters, and was trying to work him self up the accidentally angled bricks, assisted by Mr. Lavertet, who was propping him up with the muzzle of the Frenchman's own musket, when a ladder was placed, and Lord, leaping upon it, stood first upon the wall. He was followed by a Frenchman, the bandmaster of the 50th, and Col. Hope Graham. At the same instant Court, of the Sinicure, the Indian Navy, and Lieut. Bate, with a ladder at the north side of the bastion; but, although he sprang to another and got upon that, I believe that two or three Frenchmen springing to the wall from the breaking ladder got up before him. Let me mention, also, Corporal Perkins and Daniel Donovan, both volunteer Snapers, who held their place well among the French assailants, and were among the first over the wall. Meanwhile, the Chinese had been tumbling down all sorts of missiles, but when the allies were once upon the wall the great body of them retired They poured down into the city and fired from the streets; they dodged behind the buildings on the ramparts, aiming their cumbrous matchlocks from behind them. A few single encounters took place, and Luard's revolver disposed of one lingerer, but the general move was to fire right and left, and hurry to the right, to sweep the wall upwards towards the hill. Helter-skelter, away they went, driving the Tartars down into the town and before them along the wall, until, some hundred yards in front, they came upon a new body of the besiegers, who were just accomplishing another escalade.—Times.

A NARROW ESCAPE.—An unfortunate accident occurred since our last publication, by which five seamen were blown to pieces and sixteen others badly wounded, and several mortally. Some gunpowder had been discovered and was in course of removal, when a drunken marine passed with a lighted pipe in his mouth. He was told by the sailors to "get out of that," instead of which he got frightened and threw down the pipe, which instantly ignited the powder, and hence the accident. Fortunately it has proved no worse, for in a building close at hand, and near which were Commodore Elliot and a number of his brigade, were 20 or 30 tons of gunpowder in open jars, and had the fire reached them, hundreds of lives might have been lost.—China Mail.

Alleged Forgery on the Montreal Bank for $8,000.

ACQUITTAL OF THE ACCUSED.

Condensed from the London Free Press.

SPRING ASSIZES.

(Before the Hon. Chief Justice Robinson.)

LONDON, March 24, 1858.

The case of Alexander W. Anderson, charged with having forged the name of his father, Mr. Joseph Anderson, to the extent of $8,000, with intent to defraud the Montreal Bank here, is too fresh in the recollection of our readers to need recapitulation now. The trial, which took place yesterday, excited the deepest interest in this city, from the known respectability of the father of the prisoner, and the former standing of the accused. Although the jury arrived at a verdict of acquittal, yet, as there are four distinct charges of forgery, and as the indictment yesterday was founded only on one, a second trial will probably commence this morning.

Alexander Ward Anderson was indicted to take his trial for forging a note for $1,000 with intent to defraud the Bank of Montreal. Other forgeries to the extent of $8,000 were also put in as evidence. Mr. H. C. R. Becher, Q. C. conducted the case for the Crown, with Mr. Wilson, for the Montreal Bank. Mr. Eccles, Q. C. of the Toronto Bar, defended the prisoner.

William Dunn, agent of the Montreal Bank, deposed:—Am Manager of the Montreal Bank. Know the prisoner at the bar; he was in the flour and wool business. During the autumn of 1857, arranged for the prisoner to have accommodation if his father's name was endorsed to the paper. The proceeds were to be used for the purpose of purchasing produce. Knew the father, Joseph Anderson, son. The prisoner had had discounts at the bank, under a similar understanding, when trading under the firm of Anderson & Dox. The note (now handed to witness) was drawn by prisoner, and was endorsed with the name of Joseph Anderson. It was for $1,000 and dated Dec. 23rd, 1857, payable at three months after date. He (witness,) was acquainted with Joseph Anderson's signature. Did not believe the endorsement of the note was his (the father's) writing. Note was discounted by the Montreal Bank. It was brought by prisoner for discount, about the same time as it was dated. Prisoner had the proceeds of the note. (Mr. Becher here produced other notes which were handed to witness.) Note for $2,000, dated Dec. 30th, 1857, and endorsed by Joseph Anderson, was deposed to as a forgery; also a third note for $2,000, dated Nov. 12th, 1857; also, a fourth, dated Dec. 31, 1857, for $2,000. All these notes were brought by prisoner for discount, and were discounted by the bank, as well as the one the subject of the indictment. The prisoner had the proceeds. They were discounted upon the assumption that they were endorsed by the father, Joseph Anderson. These were other discounts (the notes endorsed by the father) which were genuine. There are seven genuine endorsements. First had his suspicions awakened on Jan. 31th, 1858, by the flight of the prisoner. Had no misgivings before. Ascertained from the father that the notes were not endorsed by him. Issued warrants for arrest of prisoner. He was absconding. Knew that he had been in the habit of signing notes, cheques, &c., for his father. Had seen prisoner sign for his father, Joseph Anderson. Could tell a type of three or four inches thick, of cheques signed in the name. Had not seen prisoner sign cheques for his father without putting his initials under the signature. Father knew he did this, and allowed him to do so. Never saw prisoner use his father's name since he had been in business for himself.

Joseph Anderson, Sen., father of the prisoner, was next examined by Mr. Eccles. Some notes put into court were next handed to witness.—These notes, with his name endorsed on the back, were not in his handwriting. Did not know the writing, or whose it was. His son had been clerk to him for eight years; during that time, the authority to use his name was not limited. His son signed cheques and drafts, wrote letters in his name, received and paid money on his account, &c. On retiring from business, gave it and the good-will to his son.—Had never, in any way, put an end to the authority his son had previously exercised, viz., using his name. On his (witness's) retiring from business, he always endorsed his paper, when he applied for time.—Would have done so with the notes in question, if applied to. Believed his son considered he had authority to use his (witness's) name to the note in question.

Mr. Eccles having addressed the jury on behalf of the prisoner, in a powerful speech, they retired for about two hours and returned into court with a verdict of NOT GUILTY.

Mr. Becher expressed his intention of preferring a fresh indictment against the prisoner, on another charge, in the morning; there being four distinct allegations of forgery, with "intent to defraud," &c., each of which may form the subject of a new trial.

The case lasted from 11 a. m., till past 7. p. m.

Arrival of the "Niagara."

HALIFAX, March 26.

The Royal mail steamship Niagara, Captain Workman, from Liverpool, on Saturday the 13th instant, arrived at this port this morning.

The steamship Indian, from Portland on Saturday the 27th February, had arrived at Liverpool.

ENGLAND.

On Tuesday the 2nd inst, pursuant to its adjournment, the British House of Commons met. On the 11th inst, when an announcement was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. D'Israeli, that in answer to Lord Malmsbury's note, he would take the earliest opportunity of stating that within the last hour Her Majesty's Government had received despatches from the French Government, in answer to the despatch addressed to them by Her Majesty's Government, and he had much pleasure in announcing to the House that those painful circumstances which had unhappily, for a time, subsisted between the Governments of the two countries, had entirely terminated in a spirit friendly and honourable, in a manner which he believed would be satisfactory. And as soon as her Majesty's permission had been obtained, the correspondence would be laid upon the table. He would also take the opportunity of indicating the course which Government proposes to take with reference to the public business of the country. The requirements of the public service were so urgent, that Government would require all the assistance of the House to enable them to carry out these measures. A supply was necessary for service of impending financial affairs. With regard to the first, he entered into some explanation with respect to the Militia; that in consequence of the state of affairs in India, it was intended to embody a great number of militia, and in order to defray the expenditure, he proposed to ask for a supplementary grant of £700,000. He further detailed Ministers' plans in regard to financial matters.

Several members complained that he was silent in regard to measures of general importance.

The army and navy estimates were moved for four months on account, and the motions were agreed to.

There had been some rioting in Dublin between the police and the College students. Five of the latter are said to be dangerously injured.

Rumors are afloat that satisfactory news from India had been received, but the despatch had not reached Liverpool when the Niagara left.

Rumors were current of a deficiency in the British Treasury, and of a small loan being confidentially negotiated. On the other hand, it was asserted that the Customs' revenue would exceed the estimates.

FRANCE.

A lengthy pamphlet was issued in Paris in regard to the refugee difficulty between France and England, winding up with an appeal to the English Government and people, expressing a hope that the alliance will firmly stand the trial which it is undergoing. The manifesto was regarded as a State paper and attracted much attention in France, and it is said to have produced a favourable impression in England. The reverse was the case.

It had been reported that Walewski had retired from the French foreign ministry, but the report was unconfirmed.

Lord Malmsbury's despatch had been communicated to the French Government, the form of it was not known, but it is said to be firm and conciliatory.

The appeal of Orsini and his fellow conspirators condemned to death had been refused.

Arrests continue to be numerous throughout France.

It is said that Pieri, will be Prefect of Police after the execution of Orsini and accomplices (?)

A telegram from Paris of the 11th says, that the appeal of Orsini and accomplices to the Court of Cassation, was that day rejected.

AUSTRIA.

A Vienna despatch says, that an excellent understanding has already been established between the Derby Ministry and the Austrian government.

RUSSIA.

Prince Gortschakoff was said to have issued a memorandum on the question of the navigation of the Danube to the French Government. It was directly in opposition to the views of Austria.

Russia agrees with France and England to the absolute right of the Paris Conference to deal with the subject.

LATEST BY TELEGRAPH FROM LONDON TO LIVERPOOL.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The Times city article of Friday evening say:—Consols opened this morning with great dullness at prices to which they receded last evening after regular hours, and subsequently experienced a slight further decline. Better quotations from Paris caused a recovery, and the market then was ultimately supported by a report, which, however, was not confirmed by anything received at the India House, that a telegram had arrived announcing the taking of Lucknow.

The correspondence which has passed between the Governments of France and England, will not be laid before both Houses of Parliament, but the Times of this morning gives the following synopsis of it:—

"The first of a series of despatches only arrived yesterday—both Lord Malmsbury and Count Walewski, it is affirmed, have shown great judgment and discretion. In reply to Lord Malmsbury's request for an explanation of the three passages which have so much offended the House of Commons, Count Walewski very frankly reminds the country of the undoubted proofs given by the Emperor, and of the value he attaches to our alliance by his concessions to our views, both during the war, and since the conclusion of the treaty of peace. He prayed to observe that the Emperor has been exposed to, and escaped all attempts made by assassins, who were proved to have concerted their plans in England. He thought it no presumption to appeal to the friendly feeling and justice of the nation to prevent, if possible, a recurrence of such crimes. Count Walewski repudiates in the Emperor's name any idea of wishing to include Englishmen in the category of refugees to whom he alluded, or of a desire to change our laws, or of an intention to condemn, but now regrets the misconstruction placed upon his intention. He requests that the correspondence may cease and alliance continue. The Times states, but without vouching for the accuracy of the report, that as one result of diplomatic difficulty between France and England, Comte de Persigny will not continue to represent France at this Court.

The drooping tendency with which the stock market opened, gave way owing to the buoyancy of the Paris Bourse. Consequently it was only temporarily, and the final prices were the same as yesterday, with firm markets.

MARKETS.

The English funds have been dull during the week, and were considerably affected to a slight extent by the French pamphlet. Money in moderate demand above previous rates.

The Bank of England had made no change in the rate of discount.

The Liverpool Breadstuffs market was quite dull. In Provisions there was no improvement of importance.

Consols for money closed on Friday, the 12th inst, at 96¾ to 96¾.

Further by the "Niagara."

Satisfactory news from India had been received, but the despatch had not reached Liverpool when the Niagara left.

The steamship Fulton was detained at Havre by low water, and did not sail until the night of the 14th instant. The Fulton took out but little news. Its main feature was a lengthy pamphlet, issued in Paris, in regard to the refugee difficulty between France and England. It is entitled "L'Empereur Napoleon III. et L'Angleterre," and the Paris correspondent of the Times says, though it is the work of an eminent publicist, a member of the Council of State, yet the inspiration has been derived from the highest sources.—The document treats of Napoleon's career since he was elected President; refers in glowing terms to the Anglo-French alliance, its result, and the earnest desire of the Emperor for its continuance; and then enters at great length into the refugee question, and shows the danger the French Government is constantly running from the machinations of the french refugees in London, winding up with an appeal to the English Government and people, not to be led away by false interpretations, and expressing a hope that the alliance will firmly stand the trials which it is undergoing. The manifesto was regarded as a state paper, and attracted general attention in France. It is said to have produced favourable impressions; but in England the reverse was the case.

There was a prospect of a pacific settlement of the disputes in regard to the Duchies, on account of the King of Denmark's illness.

The Niagara sailed from Halifax at 11 A. M. for Boston, where she will be due on Saturday night. Wind still, at W.; cloudy.

The screw steamship Indian, from Portland 27th ult., arrived at Liverpool at 8. 30 A. M. March 12.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The House of Commons met on the 12th inst. Mr. Disraeli said he would take the earliest opportunity of stating that within the last hour her Majesty's government had received a despatch from the French Government in answer to the despatch addressed to them by her Majesty's Government, and he had great pleasure in announcing to the House that those painful circumstances which had unhappily for a time subsisted between the two countries had entirely terminated; they had been terminated in a spirit friendly and honourable, and in a manner which he believed satisfactory to the feelings, as he was sure they would be conductive to the interests and happiness of both countries. As soon as Her Majesty's permission had been obtained, it would be his duty to lay the correspondence upon the table. He would also take this opportunity of indicating the course which the government proposed to take with reference to the public business of the country. The requirements of the public service at this moment are so urgent, that government would require all the assistance of the House in order to enable them to carry out those measures which they, in the discharge of their public duty, deemed absolutely necessary at this moment, as a supply was necessary for the service of the impending financial year. With regard to the first, he entered into some explanation with respect to the militia observing that in August last a sum of £200,000 had been granted for that service, but in consequence of the state of affairs in India it was intended to embody a greater number of militia, under the act of last session. And in order to defray the expenditure thereby caused, he proposed to ask for a supplementary vote of £700,000. With regard to the supply immediately necessary for the approaching financial year, he proposed to take a course which had often been mutually taken under the extraordinary circumstances under which the House had now assembled, and that was to take the votes on the account; but without the assistance of the House it would be extremely difficult to pass the Ways and Means bill, and also the Mutiny bill, before Easter. He further detailed ministers' plans in regard to financial matters.

Several members complained that he was silent in regard to measures of general importance.

Mr. A. KINGLAKE called the attention of the House and of the Government to the facts which have transpired of the capture of the Cagliari on the high seas by Neapolitan steamers, and to the continued imprisonment of the English Engineers.

Messrs. Parker and Watt, and asked whether there were any further papers on the subject which could be laid before the House.

Mr. DISRAELI said there was no doubt that the case of these unfortunate men was very distressing and that it had justly excited the sympathy of the country. He had himself the strongest impression that the men were not guilty, but their innocence must be demonstrated by a judicial investigation. There had been no neglect on the part of the government in attending to the case. It had been submitted to the investigation and decision of the

Our Financial Position.

By the report of what took place at the Town Council Meeting on Monday night, it will be seen that this town stands in a very queer position in regard to the railway undertaking. It is stated unmistakeably that there is no more money, and that in order to get the road finished, there must be a further sum obtained, beyond what has already been borrowed from the Municipal Loan Fund. The sum spoken of is £12,000 and of that it would appear that £3,000 must be immediately borrowed, even before a By-Law, authorizing the new issue of debentures, can be matured. It does not seem to argue such good management as ought to inspire confidence in the Council, that, without the Treasurer of the town being able to submit to the Auditors, appointed to inspect the Finance Accounts, such a statement as they can verify, it is felt by the Council necessary to apply for further authority from the people to raise a new supply. If through unforeseen accident, or miscalculation, or any other cause to which the deficiency in the accounts could be traced, a fair demand upon such fair premises were made upon the forbearance and sympathy of the ratepayers, then would we all be willing to bear the burdens respectively which will be thrown upon us. But it is not so; there is no account given, satisfactory of what has been done, and if the language of the auditors in subscribing to their report means anything, it is that from its insufficiency it ought to be tested by a power superior to theirs. We do not charge the Council with dishonesty, but we do certainly wish to understand that, so long as the debenture account remains in the imperfect condition in which it was submitted to the auditors, they have no claim upon the inhabitants of the town for their gratitude or their good opinion, and before they ask the ratepayers to grant them power to issue more debentures, they had better be in a position to give such evidence as ought to satisfy reasonable inspection of what has been done with the powers they were earlier entrusted with. There is first the discrepancy of the number of debentures between what is charged to the town in the Receiver Generals' books and what was received by the Treasurer of the town; then there is the debenture taken from the railway account to fill up a gap in the current expenses of the Town; besides much else that will certainly come up and have to be satisfactorily dealt with. We know very well that it may be urged that our position as parties to a contract may be such as to require something to be done in order to continue us in the proper condition we ought to occupy; we are quite ready to adopt this view and to allow it to have its full weight, but before we can know what our condition is there must be some expression from those who are made peculiarly guardians of it. They have with a strange economy kept up a careful barrier between themselves and the ordinary ratepayers; they have vouchsafed just as much information as they thought proper from time to time to give, and they have admitted to their Councils only such as they have chosen.—Our principal agent has been found outside of the responsibilities of the Council. The Council itself could not afford a Board of Management; they must be sought for from among those who had no responsibilities, and to be chief of them we found Mr. Clarke. What this gentleman's idea of his relation to the town has been, we may judge from his open declaration before the Council that he was the agent, the attorney of Mr. Fowler, appointed by him to arbitrate as against the town in a grave matter of dispute between them, and wishing that the Council would take notice of this fact, lest it might be a disappointment to them that he had used his best endeavours to procure for Mr. Fowler the position he laid claim to, and requiring them to appoint some other person to act in their behalf as against him. It is such a condition of things as this bespeaks, that alarms the ratepayers, and their voice must not be disregarded.

The Defeated Road Scheme.

The By-law to authorize the issuing of £50,000 in debentures of the County of Peterborough, to be expended in making gravel roads, was considered by the ratepayers, on Wednesday the 24th ultimo, and quashed by common consent; the ground of opposition being, not that the people cannot appreciate good roads, but because they find that, under present circumstances, to form a fund to be managed by commissioners, is to lay themselves open to gross and systematic plunder. They have therefore very wisely buttoned up their breeches pockets, and will keep them so, until the present hotspurs on the fence are starved in, to other employment. The decision has struck terror in the establishment of the captain of the tribe, and very much weakened the faith of his adherents in his leadership. The way to make them honest is to make them earn their own living, by their own labour; but the tendency is the other way. The people are blind, and made to scratch; the cunning man comes behind, and gathers the produce.

The trial of William Townsend, alias McHenry, for the murder of the constable, Biddlecombe, has been going on at Merrittville for several days, and the defence has not yet been entered upon. The question of identity is again the only difficulty: witness after witness is proving the prisoner to be Townsend; but on the other hand, it is said the evidence that will be offered in the defence, will prove as conclusively that the prisoner is not Townsend.

Town Council Proceedings.

The Council met on Monday evening, and among other things of little general interest, the Report of the Committee appointed to investigate the charges of application to his own uses of the Town property, preferred by the Chief Constable against Mr. Henthorn, at the time he was a Councillor of the Town was submitted and received. It is so rich a specimen of committee business that we give it in its purity; it runs as follows:

The Committee named to investigate the charges brought by the Chief Constable against Mr. Henthorn beg to report,

That if the charges referred to are true, the Chief Constable has been guilty of gross dereliction of duty in not having them legally investigated before this time; it, however, the charges are groundless, Mr. Henthorn can have legal redress if he thinks it necessary.

Committee Room, Feb. 22, 1858.

TO THE MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF THE TOWN OF PETERBOROUGH.

The Railway Committee beg leave to Report as follows:

That they have had under consideration the advancement and condition of the work on the road from Millbrook to Peterborough, and the means of providing the amount necessary to insure the early opening and completion thereof.

That they find the Contractors in considerable arrears to their Sub-Contractors and men, and that it would require a sum of about Two Thousand Pounds to discharge the most pressing demands for labour and materials, and to enable the Contractors to proceed with energy so as to have the road open for passenger and other light traffic early in May and for heavy freight in about a month after.

That no estimate for the present month has yet been made and therefore your Committee do not know how much work has been done since the last report. The Company's Engineer, however, informed some of your Committee on Wednesday last that he on that day passed over the whole of the road from Millbrook to Peterborough in a hand car, thus showing that the iron is all laid down and the connection so far complete. The Contractors have, as the engineer then stated, between eighty and a hundred men busily engaged upon the line in ballasting, filling in," &c.; and it now requires an effort on the part of the Council to endeavor to procure means to pay for labour and arrears for work, and to secure the vigorous prosecution of the work and the opening of the road for business at an early day.

In view of the benefits which would result to the Town by the early opening of the road, your Committee recommend that the Mayor be authorized to raise the sum of £3,000 in anticipation of the new By-Law, under authority of a resolution of the Council for that purpose, with the understanding that the work be prosecuted with all possible despatch, so that the road be opened for passenger and light traffic the first week in May, and for general business as soon after as practicable. Your Committee would further recommend that due precaution be taken that the money so raised shall be used for the express purpose of liquidating arrears for labour and for ensuring the vigorous prosecution of the work only.

Your Committee therefore recommend that authority be given the Mayor to raise the sum of £3,000 upon the credit and faith of this Municipality, to be repaid out of the moneys to be hereafter received on account of the debentures to be issued under authority of the new By-Law for that purpose.

All which is respectfully submitted.

E. BURNHAM,
Chairman.

Peterborough, 29th March, 1858.

And upon that Report the following resolution was carried:

Moved by Mr. Burnham, seconded by Mr. James Hall,

That the report of the Railway Committee now read be adopted, and that the Mayor in accordance therewith be and is duly authorized to raise the sum of £3,000 on the credit and good faith of this Municipality, by any Instrument executed under the seal and signature of the Corporation, that may be required to procure the accommodation proposed, said money not to be raised at a greater interest than eight per cent. and to be paid out under a resolution or resolutions of this Council respecting the same.

The Threat Carried Out.

Mr. Conger, not satisfied with the remarks we made upon the summons to surrender, communicated by his solicitor, has carried out his threat, and sues Mr. Sawers for £500, as compensation for his supposed grievance. We have no hesitation in telling Mr. Conger that, instead of his wounded feelings being soothed by a verdict, he will bite his lip, at the folly he has committed, in presuming to stifle a fair discussion by the Press upon what invites the closest scrutiny. It is the old game of bad men, to allow freedom to the Press, only when it assists them in their enslavement of the people; and Mr Conger will be added to the list of sufferers, whose temerity has led them into such a conflict; freemen being judges. The trial will be at the Assizes commencing April 27.

New Reciprocity Regulations.

The following new regulations have been issued from the Treasury Department at Washington. They will be found to operate very inconveniently in this Province, where so much lumber and other raw produce depends upon the United States for a market. There is no reason given for subjecting the importers of articles into that country to such restrictions:—

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
"12th February, 1858.

"Collectors and other officers of the customs of the frontier ports are instructed, that, on all importations from the North American British Provinces claiming exemption from duty under the stipulations of the reciprocity treaty, the proof described in section 3, article 2, of the growth or production of the merchandise, is required in all cases where the actual value of the merchandize shall exceed the value of one hundred dollars, and where there is no Consular Officer at or near the port of exportation, the oath prescribed in forms Nos. 278 and 279 may be taken before a local magistrate, duly authorized by the laws of the country to administer oaths, which oath, so taken shall be accompanied by a Consular certificate in the following form:

"I certify that ——, the person signing the above certificate, as a magistrate, is duly authorized to administer oaths by the laws of this Province, and that I believe the statement contained in the above certificate to be true.

(Date) ——, U. S. Consul.

"The oaths prescribed in forms Nos. 280 and 281 are dispensed with.

"In cases of parcels or packages of merchandize of a value not exceeding one hundred dollars, the same may be admitted to entry without the aforesaid proof, provided the collector is satisfied that they are the growth or produce of the said Provinces.

"A Consular certificate of the origin of the merchandize, in the form following, may also be received by collectors as sufficient evidence of origin to entitle merchandize to entry under the reciprocity act:

"I certify that the goods or merchandize described in this invoice are of the growth or produce of the Province of ——, and of the value within stated.

"—— ——, U. S. Consul.

"Secretary of the Treasury."

The correspondence which has passed between the governments of France and England, will not be laid before the Houses of Parliament, but the Times of the 13th gives the synopsis of it:—The last of the series of despatches only arrived yesterday afternoon. Both Lord Malmesbury and Count Walewski, it is affirmed, have throughout shown great judgment and discretion. In reply to Lord Malmesbury's request for an explanation of those passages which have so much offended the House of Commons, Count Walewski very frankly reminds the country of the undoubted proofs given by the Emperor of the value he attached to our alliance by his concessions to our views, both during the Crimean war and since the conclusion of the treaty of peace. He proceeds to observe that, after the Emperor had been many times exposed to and escaped many attacks made by the assassins, were proved to have concocted their plans in England, he thought it no presumption to appeal to the friendly feeling and justice of our nation to prevent, if possible, a recurrence of such crimes. Count Walewski repudiates in the Emperor's name, any idea of wishing to include Englishmen in the category of refugees to whom he alluded, or of a desire to change our laws, or of any intention to condemn them. But now regretting misconstruction placed on his intention, he requests that the correspondence may cease and the alliance continue.

Life Insurance Companies.

From the Montreal Gazette.

We are in receipt of a circular from the Life Association of Scotland, which has recently established a head office for Canada in our city, and has also extended its operations to the whole of British North America, from which we derive some valuable information. We are glad to see that the attention of the people of Great Britain is now directed more actively to Canada, than hitherto, and we shall welcome as evidence of this the establishment of first-class institutions amongst us—such as the one in question. We observe that the books of the Company close on the 5th of April next, and that entrants before that period rank as of one year's longer standing than later entrants. The Company has, during the last three years alone, assured upwards of three thousand lives, for more than a million-and-a-half pounds sterling. Its income is £125,000 stg. per annum. It has paid to families of assured, since its establishment, £203,337. The profits are apportioned every year to policy holders of five years' standing, the share of each being handed to them in reduction of their annual premiums, and for many years the premiums have thus been reduced to less than two-thirds of the stipulated amount. Policy-holders for £1000 stg. or upwards may allow half of the premiums to remain unpaid at interest, and pay for the first six years only half the amount. The Company holds out another great advantage, as after five years, if the full premium has been paid up, the policy is not forfeited by omission to pay the premium within the 21 days allowed, but it remains in force for one year, if payment be made within that time with an extra fine. Viewing life insurance as a duty incumbent upon all men with limited incomes—and, moreover, as a system specially adapted to the necessities and circumstances of the great majority of the inhabitants of this country, we commend this subject to the consideration of the many, who would find a peace of mind that is now unknown to them, in the reflection that their families were provided for, in the event of their premature decease.

Arrival of the "City of Baltimore."

NEW YORK, March 30.

The City of Baltimore from Liverpool, 17th inst., arrived this morning.

The Alps did not leave with the Baltimore as advertised.

The correspondence between Malmsbury and Walewski is published. Very conciliatory on both sides. Walewski regrets the misapprehension of his original despatch, withdraws from the discussion and appeals to the loyalty of the English people.

Parliamentary proceedings of but little importance. Bombay dates to the 24th February received.

A large portion of the British army had entered Oude.

Sir Colin Campbell was still at Cawnpore awaiting the siege train.

Lucknow expected to be bombarded on the 25th February.

The King of Delhi has been found guilty and banished for life.

The steamer Ava with Calcutta mails and over a quarter of a million sterling in specie lost near Trincomalee on the 16th February. Cargo and mails lost, but no lives.

Orsini and Pierri were guillotined 13th March. Rudio was reapted to penal servitude for life.

Other continental news unimportant.

The riot at Dublin was alluded to in both Houses, and Government promised strict investigation.

The Commons passed the India Loan Bill.

Disraeli had stated the case of Cagliari, and been unbuttoned to the two officers of the Crown, and Government would act upon their opinion, irrespective of the action of the late Government, which had acknowledged the jurisdiction of Naples.

It was stated that Mr. Roebuck had received a challenge from Colonel DeLigney, a French officer, for his language in relation to France.

INDIA.

All quiet in the Punjaub.

The Rajpootana field forces were en route for Kotah, where the enemy was said to be 7,000 strong, and with 100 guns.

Shorapore, in Molams' dominions, had been captured, and the Rajah had been seized.

At Henderab the Bareilli rebels were defeated, February 10th.

It is stated that Nena Sahib had crossed the Ganges with a strong force, to enter Bundlecund.

FRANCE.

The execution of Orsini and Pierri took place on the 13th. From 100,000 to 200,000 people assembled to witness the execution. They were kept at a distance by the military, of whom 50,000 were on the spot. Both met their doom with firmness. Pierri sang the well-known "Mourir pour la Patrie" on his way to the scaffold, and on the block cried "Vive L'Italia." "Vive La Republique." Orsini's last cry was "Vive La France."

RUSSIA.

The Russians have captured the important defile of Argoune in the Caucasus.

The Chinese had attacked the Russian outposts towards the mouth of the Amoor so suddenly that the Russians had to retreat 30 leagues from the Rivers.

The Chinese destroyed the Russian settlement.

Interesting from France.

One Senator—one only—has vote lagainst the "Public Safety Bill." His name deserves to be recorded. It is General McMahon, the brave soldier who commanded the assault upon the Malakoff Tower. General McMahon's conduct has produced a great effect. He has, for solong as Louis Napoleon reigns here, stopped his military career; but he has raised himself mountains high in the estimation of all really honest men. The Faubourg St. Germain again blame M. Mahon, and say he has done such a foolhardy thing; and they dread lest any part of the responsibility of his conduct should ever fall upon them. The people believe great credit to the undaunting intrepidity and real skill displayed on this occasion. The sailors were specially useful to Major Nicholson, in the management of the ropes which replaced the broken part of the iron work of the suspension bridge.

On the morning of the 22nd of January I rode out, accompanied by the chief Engineer officer, to see if the bridge was ready for the advance of the column. Shortly after my arrival, while I was inspecting the work, which was near complete, I observed an unusual movement amongst the villagers in a village about half a mile to the right front of the bridge. It soon became evident that an attack was about to be made on the working parties. The picquet, which had been placed on the enemy's side of the river, to cover the working party, was quickly reinforced. The sappers, chiefly consisting of a wing of the 53rd Regiment, skilfully laid out by Major Pavn, of that corps, under the direction of Brigadier Hope, to the left and along the road. The enemy attacked with musketry, whilst the 53rd was passing the bridge in support, and the heavy guns were being advanced from the position in which they had originally been placed, to cover the working parties. The right wing of the 93rd Highlanders remained on the right bank of the Kalee Nuddee, in reserve. A raking fire was quickly opened by Lieutenant Vaughan, of the Naval Navy, and Major Smith, commanding a field battery of Artillery, not any caving expedient to press the enemy till the remainder of the force should come up, for which orders were sent: the position now taken up by the 53rd Regiment was secured, and the fire of the enemy kept down by our guns, but an advance was not permitted. I may mention that the banks had been secured, when the bridge was first occupied, by the detachment of a wing of the Highlanders at Rowan, a village about three miles to the right, where there was a ford. A patrol had been sent on the previous day to destroy whatever boats might be found, for several miles up the Kalee Nuddee, to the left of the bridge. At 11 A. M. the main column from the old camp began to arrive, Brigadier Greathead's brigade leading. At the same time it was observed that the enemy had got a heavy gun in position, which had not opened before 2½ o'clock P. M., the 53rd supported by the 93rd, advanced on the village, to the right, which had already been evacuated in consequence of the fire brought upon it; whilst Brigadier Greathead marched along the left bank, the cavalry moving on the road on the line of the enemy's retreat towards Futtehgurh. The retreat of the enemy soon became a rapid flight, considerable execution being inflicted by the cavalry, under the immediate superintendence of Brigadier General Grant and Brigadier Little, all the guns which had been opposed to us, viz. Gwlie Return) eight in number, fell into our hands.

In this skirmishing all the troops engaged behaved remarkably well; and the only fault I had to find was with their great eagerness for attack. The rebels who were dispersed on this occasion consisted of three or four battalions, 41st and other corps of Native infantry. In the 41st the rebels had been at with much system to organize a second battalion, their recruits being dressed in a neat uniform. The route was complete, and it is said apparently on good authority, that the fugitives who escaped have made for Bareilly

The camp was pitched late in the evening on the road to Futtehgurh, five miles from the Kalee Nuddee, where I had the pleasure of finding Captain Seaton, who had ridden over from to report the arrival of his force and convoy in person. He was directed to make certain arrangements with the latter, and to close on Futtehgurh, after being joined by Brigadier Walpole. A very large stock of grain was ordered to be sent to Cawnpore, in case that district, and enlighten the labors of the Commissariat, for the supply of Sir James Outram.

On the 3rd I marched on Futtehgurh, which had been deserted after the defeat of the previous day by all the followers of Nawab. The flight of the rebels was so rapid that they had no time to complete the destruction of the government property. It is with the utmost satisfaction I have to inform your lordship of the very large amount of stores, of the most valuable description, belonging to the late gun and clothing agencies, which have been saved to the state. A notorious murderer, one Najir Khan, was seized with his guns in the town. I caused this to be done by the inhabitants, under fear of punishment on themselves. He was executed at the principal gate on the 4th inst.

"Such is the prayer which from my cell I dare address to your Majesty, not despairing but that my feeble voice may be heard. I beseech your Majesty, restore to Italy the independence which her children lost in 1849, through the very fault of the French. Let your Majesty call to mind that the Italians, among whom was my father, joyfully shed their blood for Napoleon the Great, wherever he chose to lead them: that they were faithful to him until his fall; and that so long as Italy shall not be independent, the tranquility of Europe and that of your Majesty will only be vain illusions.

"May your Majesty not reject the last prayer of a patriot on the steps of a scaffold. May you deliver my country, and the blessings of twenty-five millions of citizens will follow you to posterity.

Despatch from Sir Colin Campbell.

COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Head Quarters, Fort Futtehburgh,
January 5th, 1858.

MY LORD—I have already had the honor to inform your Lordship by telegraph of the various arrangements which have been made for the march of the force, under my immediate command, up the Doab.

Having been obliged to part with much of my carriage to meet the wants of Major General Sir J. Outram, G. C. B., in Oude, considerable delay was unavoidable at Cawnpore after the action of the 6th.

The time, however, was not lost. A brigade under Brigadier the Hon. Adrian Hope was detached to Bithoor, where every prestige of Nena Sahib's property was destroyed, and after very considerable exertion, which I thanked was recovered from the wells belonging to the former palace. The troops had evidently suffered severely, and it was not considered when it was necessary for Brigadier Hope to close on me subsequent to my march. The 88th foot was accordingly ordered out from Cawnpore under Colonel Maxwell, C. B., to protect the rear which had already been attended with much success. An order has been given to transfer the treasure so found to Mr. Shearer, the civil magistrate at Cawnpore.

Another brigade having been detached under Brigadier Walpole to make a detour by Jehanpoor, through Etawah in Hyposre, with orders to join me on the Grand Trunk Road. The effect of this movement has been excellent, and Captain Bradford, the officer whom I selected to act as a special commissioner, to accompany Brigadier Walpole's force, has been enabled to shape out the police arrangements. He has punished some notorious malefactors and disaffected districts, as shown by the returns now forwarded, and I beg to refer you to the Secretary of the Government. In consequence of the march of this force it would appear that there is now a complete escape of rebels and bad characters from the southern part of the Doab. Brigadier Walpole crossed the river yesterday at Perrung-ghee, and has secured my entire approval for the able and judicious manner in which he has carried out the duty entrusted to him.

I am informed by the civil authorities that my protracted stay at Cawnpore was of much benefit, and am convinced that, apart from any immediate object, it is necessary that the march of the troops should be steady.

Having completed my means of movement with the carts which had arrived from Allahabad on the 23rd December, after conveying the wounded to that station, I marched to Chowbepore on the 24th.

On the 28th, while the head-quarters and one brigade were encamped to Meeranka Serai, Major-General Windham, C. B., was detached with his remaining brigade to Punjah, the Rebels of which place already had his fort the night of the advance from Cawnpore. The fort was destroyed by the engineers, and several rebels belonging to the village in the neighborhood were dispersed of by the magistrate. Mr. Power accompanied this brigade and was enabled to make a good return round the country.

Measures were taken, from our central halting place, to destroy the country boats on the Ganges, in order to prevent the interception of the Doab from the Oude of the river, when the troops should have moved on. A considerable number were burnt, but it is probable that many may have escaped to Oude.

On the 31st December the leading brigade arrived at Omeergurgee, Brigadier Greathead and Major General Windham closing up, the one from the Oude in the evening, and the other from Futtehgurh the next day.

Early on the forenoon of the 1st January Brigadier Hope was sent forward with two regiments to the Kalee Nuddee, to prevent the further destruction of the iron Suspension bridge, by the rebels. They disappeared on his approach, and the corps of Royal Engineers, and Bengal Sappers, with a party of sailors, under Major Nicholson, Royal Engineers, set to work with great vigor, and worked day and night for the repair of the bridge, which had been very much injured. I consider that Major Nicholson and the officers under his command, deserve great credit for the undaunting industry and real skill displayed on this occasion. The sailors were specially useful to Major Nicholson, in the management of the ropes which replaced the broken part of the iron work of the suspension bridge.

On the morning of the 22nd of January I rode out, accompanied by the chief Engineer officer, to see if the bridge was ready for the advance of the column. On the 3rd I marched on Futtehgurh, which had been deserted after the defeat of the previous day by all the followers of Nawab. The flight of the rebels was so rapid that they had no time to complete the destruction of the government property. It is with the utmost satisfaction I have to inform your lordship of the very large amount of stores, of the most valuable description, belonging to the late gun and clothing agencies, which have been saved to the state. A notorious murderer, one Najir Khan, was seized with his guns in the town. I caused this to be done by the inhabitants, under fear of punishment on themselves. He was executed at the principal gate on the 4th inst.

Mr. Power, civil service, has applied to me to sanction the appointment of Mr. Capper, civil service, to assist him in the Futtehgurh district. Mr. Power represents his new assistant as a man of much experience in these districts, and acquainted with the people. I have therefore ventured to give the sanction required, subject to your lordship's approval.

The destruction of Newab's palaces is in process. I think it right that not a stone should be left untarned in all the residences of the rebellious chiefs. They are far more guilty than their misguided followers.

A brigade will proceed to-morrow to visit two very mutinous villages, at a distance of some 20 miles from Futtehgurh. A garrison has been left at Myndorie, consisting of Her Majesty's 38th Foot, 1 field battery gens, and 200 Wallo Horse. This garrison will furnish the escorts from Myndoorie to Agra, so long as such precautions are necessary.

I have intimated to Col. Fraser, the Chief Commissioner of the North-West Provinces, that it is not expedient to leave a small detachment of itself at Etawah, but that that place should trust rather to the influence of the Myndoorie garrison on the one side, and the last arrangements made by me in the Cawnpore district on the other. That arrangement consists of a moveable column which is now being organized by Brigadier Inglis, at Cawnpore, for the purpose of marching about the district in aid of the civil power. Having reached this point, and the communication being fairly established between Calcutta and Agra, I await your lordship's further instructions.

C. CAMPBELL, General,
Commander-in-Chief.

Forgery Case Again.—Second Trial of the Prisoner.

(From the London Free Press.)

Yesterday afternoon, the trial of A. W. Anderson on a second charge of forgery, was commenced. The note which is the subject of this indictment was for the sum of $2,000, and was paid by the bank on the 23rd of December last. The evidence, for the most part was a mere repetition of that adduced on the former trial. The only new feature introduced was the production of a letter, by counsel for the Crown, written by the prisoner to his father previous to his leaving London, but which was not delivered until he had left. It contained a summary of the prisoner's own personal endorsements, and gave as his reason for running away his inability to meet these endorsements. It also gave a statement of his liabilities and assets, and spoke of the notes (for which he is charged as forging,) as ordinary transactions, and not as an admission of guilt. The former witnesses were re-examined, and Mr. Eccles addressed the jury with his usual ability, resting his defence on the same view of the case as in the first trial, with the additional plea that the letter produced, instead of being an argument for the guilt of the prisoner, was, on the contrary, a stronger evidence that he had no intention of defrauding the Bank, but had used his father's name as a matter of course.

At half-past 11 the jury, not having arrived at any verdict, the Judge adjourned the Court till half-past 12, and intimated that, if they did not then agree to a verdict, they must be detained in custody all night.

LATER.

(From the London Free Press, March 27th.)

Shortly before 11 o'clock yesterday morning, Alexander Ward Anderson was brought up to be discharged on the verdict of "acquittal" found by the jury on the previous evening.

Mr. Becher, Q. C., stated that, after the two verdicts that had been found, he did not feel inclined to press the prosecution further against the prisoner.

The learned judge, the Hon. Chief Justice Robinson, then addressed the prisoner at the bar in an expressive and forcible manner. He said, doubtless the prisoner himself was not a little surprised at the verdict recorded last night. On the first trial of the accused, it appeared quite incomprehensible to him (the judge) how any person could have any doubt as to the guilt of the prisoner; but when the second trial came on, he could not see how any person could have the slightest doubt of his guilt. It appeared to him (the judge) strange how such a decision could be arrived at in the face of the letter which he had written to his father before he left, and which was produced in evidence at the second trial. How, supposing that the father was entitled to the character he held, the prisoner could dare write such a letter to his father, proposing a fraudulent disposition of his property, he could not tell. He (the learned judge) had been a long while concerned in the administration of justice, and had never before seen the sympathies of the community so sadly misplaced as in this instance. He had had cases before him, where, although theft had been committed, yet a degree of sympathy (however wrong) had been manifested by the public; but he never before saw sympathy so strongly exhibited to a person in whose favour so little should be shown.

The prisoner was then formally discharged.

A considerable crowd was present, who heard the impressive admonition of the judge, which was listened to with marked respect and in deep silence, and which obviously made a profound impression.

United States Canals.

From the New York Courier.

We stated on Monday that it was the policy of our State to complete the enlargement of our Canals, as they afforded a means for transportation with which, in many respects Railroads could not compete. The interest of the State requires that we should offer to western shippers a route over which they can transport their freight at a price which will induce them to seek it in preference to the many others which are now open. We have opposed the imposition of tolls upon our Railroads, on the grounds that such a measure would drive the freight which they now carry into other channels, and that our canals would thereby gain nothing. Our policy is, therefore, to complete our Canals, and to place the tolls at the lowest rates—not by any means to raise them as sum have suggested. It has been stated that flour has already been shipped from Ohio to this city by the way of Philadelphia; and we now find that it can be sent from Toronto, by the way of Portland, at a less cost than it can be by the Suspension Bridge and the N. Y. Central Road. These are facts which it behooves us to consider, and they impress upon us more than ever, the necessity of offering to the West a cheap means of transportation. The Grand Trunk Railway, and the Montreal and Portland Road, have offered inducements to western freight which have produced a marked effect. The Detroit Free Press states, that the receipts of flour and grain and lumber at Rochester, Oswego, and other ports on the lake, have fallen off greatly in the past year, while they have increased at a proportionate rate in Montreal and Quebec. So marked are the results which have sprung from the establishment of these roads, and the line of steamers from Quebec and Portland, that the Governor of Canada in his last Message held the following language:

"I congratulate you on the continued success of the Canadian Line of Steamers.—They have already placed our intercourse with Europe on a new footing, and I look forward with pleasure to the establishment of a weekly line to the St. Lawrence during the next summer. I recommend to your notice the increasing value of the Lake Commerce of Canada. Our trade with Chicago and the Western States promises to be important alike to the Upper and the Lower sections of the Province."

There are merchants in Detroit who, it is said have for the past year made all their shipments to Europe over these routes rather than by the way of New York, for the reason that they could do it at a cheaper rate. With such a rival close by, it would be the greatest folly on our part to adopt any measures which will tend to divert from the proper channels our Western trade. As has been before stated, our railroad companies have been obliged to raise their fares because the old rates are too low, and it may be that the rates at which the Canadian roads are now running will be found to be below what they should be. It is, of course, the policy of the managers of these roads to divert as much of the trade as they possibly can by low rates, supposing that hereafter they will be able to raise them. Such, we presume, must be the principle upon which they are now acting, for otherwise a barrel of flour could not be sent from Toronto to this city by the way of Portland, at a cheaper rate than over the Central road.

With rival transportation routes which now surround the State, and ten which such strenuous exertion is made to obtain the freight which should pass through our Canals, it is manifest that to make the completion of the enlargement a mere political folly. All parties are most certainly interested in the prosperity of our State, and the measures which shall be adopted to ensure this should be those which appear to an enlightened person the most likely to be attended with success. Whether they proceed from Republican, Democratic or American parties, should make no difference, and it is for this reason that we have advocated the plan proposed by the Albany Argus for raising the money required to complete our Canals. If either of the parties have a better one to offer, let it be known at once. All that we desire is, that the trade which belongs to us should not be divided and that for the sake of party, nothing should be done which would tend to defeat the object in view.

The bill now before the Legislature imposing tolls upon railroads will probably be defeated. We have already said that the measure which it proposes is one which cannot benefit our canals, while it will drive to the Pennsylvania and other roads freight which now passes through our State. Having in view, therefore, the numerous transportation routes with which our State is surrounded, it is manifestly our best policy not to toll our railroads, but let them remain in a position to compete successfully with rival routes; and then put the toll on our Canals to the lowest rates—if necessary, so low as only to cover expenses. The State debt can be provided for by tax, to run any number of years that may be deemed expedient. We trust that this question will be brought before the Legislature at the earliest moment, as it is one second in importance to none which has yet been passed.

Sir William and Lady Don—A Domestic Scene.

On Monday afternoon, the town was somewhat alarmed by a rumour that Lady Don, the wife of Sir William Don, Bart., had attempted to put a period to her existence by poisoning herself. On inquiry, we learn that these are something like the facts as to what did occur: Sir William had for the few days of his then indisposed to the friendly sit of one of the actors, for the performance of sundry good offices, and he had evinced a proper disposition by remembering those tokens of past kindness. It is said that this worked on the feelings of Lady Don, who has not the same kindly disposition towards the actor referred to as her husband has, and that she had given utterance to her emotions in such a way that Sir William left home on Monday morning without according her the usual greeting. This so worked upon the lady's feelings that she determined to get up a scene, with a view if possible, of thus breaking up a connection which to her was so disagreeable. For that purpose she called forth to a chemist and bought a quantity of laudanum, which she pretended was to cure an attack of toothache. She then went to another shop and made a small purchase. Sir William had gone out for a day's shooting, intending to return to dinner. But in the afternoon there was a report that Lady Don had taken poison. Mr. Rendle, the surgeon, was at once sent for, and he brought his stomach-pump to relieve the unhappy lady of what was likely to prove a most disagreeable burden to her. By this time Lady Don had come to her senses. She had a hearty and instinctive abhorrence of the stomach-pump. She declared to Mr. Rendle, that she had not taken the laudanum; but he, on the other hand, said the pump must be used. At this time Sir William came home, and hearing from the servant what had taken place, he rushed up stairs and urged the immediate use of the pump. The story could not be believed, and it was only on her declaring by the memory of her mother, that she had not taken the foul and pestilent stuff, that she was allowed to go off without being the subject of the doctor's manipulations. When Lady Don had tasted the "physic," it did not strike her as being very agreeable, and she took something to take the taste out of her mouth

THE "SEA SERPENT" CAUGHT.—The following letter, giving an account of the capture of what at first appeared to be the vegetable sea serpent, we copy from the London Times of Feb. 12th:—

SIR.—In your paper of the 5th inst., is a letter from Captain Harrington, of the ship Castilian, stating his belief that he had seen the great sea serpent near St. Helena. His confidence is strengthened from the fact of something similar having been seen by her Majesty's ship Daedalus near the same position. The following circumstance, which occured on board the ship Peleus, then belonging to Messrs. T. and W. Smith, on her passage from Mauritius, may be of some service respecting this "queer fish." On December the 28th, 1848, being then in lat. 26 S. lon. 6. E. nearly calm, ship having only steerage way, saw about half a mile on port beam a very extraordinary looking thing in the water of considerable length. With the telescope we could plainly discern a huge head and neck, covered with a long shaggy-looking kind of mane, which it kept lifting at intervals out of the water. This was seen by all hands and declared to be the great sea serpent. I determined on knowing something about it, and accordingly lowered a boat, in which my chief officer and 4 men went, taking with them a long small line in case it should be required.

I watched them very anxiously, and the monster seemed not to regard their approach. At length they got close to the head. They seemed to hesitate, and then busy themselves with the line, the monster all the time docking his head, and showing its great length. Presently the boat began pulling towards the ship, the monster following slowly. In about half-an-hour they got along-side; a tackle was got on the main yard, and it was hoisted on board. It appeared somewhat supple when hanging, but so completely covered with snaky-looking barnacles, about 15 inches long, that we had it some time on board before it was discovered to be a piece of gigantic seaweed, 20 feet long and 4 inches in diameter, the root end of which appeared, when in the water, like the head of the animal, and the motion given by the sea caused it to seem alive. In a few days it dried up to a hollow tube, and as it had a rather offensive smell was thrown overboard.

I had only been a short time in England when the Dædalus arrived and reported having seen the great sea serpent,—to the best of my recollection, near the same locality, and which I have no doubt was a piece of the same weed. So like a huge living monster did

ELLIS'S PATENT ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to be distinguished by the eye from natural stone, and will resist all extremes of climate, forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its Beauty.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its Durability.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its Cheapness.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

N. B.—WANTED—Agents for Sale of Licences or to make and vend in each county.

PLASTER. PLASTER.

VIENNA PLASTER!

THE undersigned, begs leave to inform the Farmers of Canada, and all concerned in the use of Land Plaster, that he is now prepared to supply all who may favor him with their patronage with the above named article.

The following analysis of this Plaster prepared by the most eminent chemist in the city of New York is proof of the superior qualities of this Plaster over any other in the State of New York:

"This certifies that I have analysed a specimen of Vienna Plaster, and also a specimen of Cayuga or Onondaga Plaster, and find them to yield respectively as follows:—

Vienna Plaster.

Sulphate of Lime	70.92
Carbonate of Lime	4.45
" of Magnesia	1.50
Alumina	2.46
Silica	1.84
Protoxide of Iron	.21
Water	18.38
Loss	.29
	100.10

JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D.
New York, March 19, 1854. Chemist.

Onondaga Plaster.

Sulphate of Lime	63.20
Sulphuric of Lime	1.01
Carbonate of Lime	9.30
" of Magnesia	1.90
Alumnia	3.80
Silicia	2.26
Protoxide of Iron	23.10
Loss	.34
	100.00

Cayuga Plaster.

Sulphate of Lime	80 40
Sulphuret of Lime	2.00
Carbonate of Lime	10.00
" of Magnesia	2.00
Alumnia	4.00
Silicia	4.40
Protoxide of Iron	.30
Water	16.50
Loss	.40
	100.00

JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D.
New York, April 2, 1853. Chemist.

It appears from the above analysis that the Vienna Plaster is superior for land to that of the Cayuga and Onondaga, as he much as it contains the largest percentage of Lime, which is the most beneficial property in Land Plaster.

The French Government.

From the London Times.

It can serve no good purpose for us to avoid allusion to a matter which has become the subject of common conversation, and which may at any time produce consequences important to ourselves. The position of the French Government and the state of things which now exists in Paris are notoriously the cause of much uneasiness throughout Europe. The feeling must naturally be strongest in this country. We are close neighbours of France, we are joined to the French people politically and commercially, we are no less by their alliea, acting with them on several great European questions, but, which is of even more importance, the two communities are united by commercial relations, which affect the intense interests directly or indirectly of half the families in England. The prices of French funds and French railway shares are quoted every day on the London market, our manufacturers supply the French with a number of articles, and our people take other articles in return. Then, the English are fond of travelling and excursions; Paris is within twelve hours of London, and they have of late years come to consider a visit to the French capital as a pleasant way of spending a few days which they may have to spare. So, while fully admitting that no nation has a right to interfere in the domestic concerns of France, we must be allowed to express our sorrow at the system of government which is being organised in that country, and to raise a voice of remonstrance, while there is yet time. This we do with no feeling of hostility to the existing authorities, but merely in the interest of quiet and good order in Europe. Common sense, when not blinded by fear or the intoxication of power, must point out how dangerous are elaborate schemes of surveillance and repression, and how hopeless the attempt to check the tongue or watch the movements of many millions of people.

We are told that the Ministry of Police is to be organized, and that its Chief will be placed in the first rank of Ministers. He should, indeed, take precedence of them all, for everything seems likely to be brought within the sphere of his control. The gay city of Paris, the home of social intercourse, of lively conversation and free opinions, hardly knows itself. The outward aspect of the place is the same; there are the same Boulevards, the same fountains flowing in the sun, the same cafés frequented by the same loungers, and in private life the same drawing-rooms and hangings and toilets. But over everything there is gloom and uneasiness. People are talking timidly, and with unusual dullness on unusually commonplace topics. Families are hesitating whom they shall visit and whom they shall be visited by. Men consider whether they ought to be seen walking with a friend whom they have known for years. Two persons will be speaking together, and on seeing a third about to join them will suddenly pause and turn the conversation. There will be in the midst of a social concourse a man who checks the mirth and puts a guard upon every tongue. People will talk with him, shake hands with him, but they will be careful of what they say before him. Individuals are careful of what books they have in their libraries, what papers they have in their writing desks. They do not talk affably with their inferiors, as light-hearted Frenchmen in the old times did. The concierge, the waiter at the café, even the private servants are kept at a distance. In a railway carriage it is as well not to be over communicative to a neighbour. In a letter it is well to confine yourself to your own private business and good wishes for your correspondent's health. For Paris and France are under strict surveillance, and no one knows who are the wit chers and who are the watched. The Empire is corporeal. Its incarnation is a man armed. It is not only that recognized agents of police are in every street and every public place, that the comings and goings of well-known Democrats are watched, that the assemblies of Communists are hunted out, but men of every rank, every phase of character, every shade of political opinions, are at the mercy of an immense army of spies, who penetrate everywhere, who follow the individual into the confidence even into his family and his private life, and who have spread distrust and apprehension throughout the country. It has, indeed, long been the misfortune of France that the security of private relations has been weakened by the means used by Government to obtain intelligence, and that fact has, doubtless, no little effect on society and domestic life; but it would seem that now the evil has assumed fearful proportions. We hear of professional spies of every supposed rank in life, from the well-dressed gentleman to the working man in his blouse; we hear of lorettes paid for information concerning those with whom they associate; we hear of hotels and restaurants being frequented by persons whose duty it is to listen to the conversation of suspicious visitors, and to endeavour to draw them into an expression of opinion. But the worst feature of all is the encouragement of domestic treachery by the corruption of private servants. No one can be secure that the man who brushes his coat, or the woman who attends on his children is not in correspondence with the police. We are not repeating any gobe-mouche gossip; we are stating facts proved beyond a doubt, and commenting on practices which are not even denied. Domestic servants of every degree are encouraged to report what passes in the houses where they are employed—who comes, who goes, what is said, what is proposed to be done. Apart from the moral degradation which a Government receives by a resort to such practices, it is evident that the information must be most untrustworthy. The sort of half-knowledge which servants have of their masters' proceedings will naturally cause them to distort all they see and hear. The most innocent conversation will be misinterpreted; any allusion which the spy does not understand will be construed into treason; a letter from England or a trip into Switzerland will be at once a correspondence with refugees, and disaffection will be found in a shrug of the shoulders or a raising of the eyebrow. How much will this tendency to exaggeration be increased when the servant knows that the value of his report and the reward he receives rise in proportion to the incrimination of his virtue.

Such a system as this, added to the new law of public security and the appointment of General Espinasse, has naturally thrown over the Capital a gloom which seems not likely to be dissipated. The baneful consequences, even in a material point of view, are to be found in the sudden depression of business and the general anxiety of the mercantile world. The whole policy of the French Government of late is indeed much to be regretted. No one who has watched the career of the Emperor and has seen his opportunities can help regretting that he should have allowed those who surrounded him to entangle him in such a net. He has involved himself in a system which no man can hope to control, and which must every day become unmanageable. He is striving to take the whole of France into custody. To have every man of wealth or position, or political note in the empire, every theorist, or lunatic, or sanguinous democrat, or reckless desperado under his eye, is the purpose of the present ruler. That he must be unsuccessful we know beforehand, and the question is whether the only evil will be the failure of his object. Our own opinion must be that such a machinery will tend to create what it seeks to repress. Sedition will be generated by the intolerable omnipresence of the police. Every advance of the new power will necessitate a still further extension, until a crisis arrives, on which it would be premature to speculate.

The proceedings of the French Government are not only unjust but unwise. What was there in the attempt of January 14th which called for such measures? The general impression at the time that the deed would add to the Emperor's popularity, and the results of an examination seemed to confirm this view. Four or five Italians were alone overtly concerned in the crime, and it would have been in the power of the Imperial Court to proclaim that France and Frenchmen were strangers to the tremor. The circumstances of the act might also have shown the Emperor and his advisers how little can be done by the most elaborate system of precaution. In spite of passports, and police, and telegraphic despatches, the assassins penetrated to the Emperor's person with their instruments of death, and a score of police agents, blind to their master's danger, were struck down by the explosion. Ought not this to have been a warning that security is to be sought rather in the confidence and respect of the people than in the web of detection? The exhibition by the Emperor of confidence in his subjects would have done more to defeat future attempts than any penal law. Frenchmen, even while they did not love their ruler, would have respected him, had they seen him continuing to maintain the confident bearing for which he has always been before so remarkable. Something like contempt will be the feeling for this frenzy of repression in a Sovereign who used to show himself so fearlessly, and who was at least as safe driving his Phaeton like a private gentleman on the Boulevards as when surrounded by spies and with whole squadrons for an escort. That the Ministers of the Emperor are more to blame than their master we can well believe, but he himself will have to bear all the punishment. Distrust and fear reign in Paris, but nowhere will they be stronger than in the Imperial breast. All history teaches that those who govern by such means suffer more than they inflict. Why should Napoleon III., after all his exploits and his glory, prepare for himself the old age of Tiberius? He has still to be admired Chief of a free and great people, why should he throw it away under the advice of men whose ingenuity is no secret to Europe? Personally he has the good wishes of the world; no one wishes to see his Empire overthrown to make place for an effete Bourbon or a Republican President. But, in the name of a friendly people, we must tell him that the system which his Ministers have organised for the government of a high-spirited nation is full of danger to himself and the world. It is a mockery for the suppression of all private political action? Is it thus that the quick-witted people can be totally de, rived of intellectual food by the extinction of the public press? Already men of every class are uneasy, and the rule of political officers resembles that of enslaved Rome. If a man is popular, he is dangerous to the throne; if he is rich, he is likely to be a powerful enemy; if he is poor, poverty may spur him on to crime; if he is lively, he must be ex, cting some additional intelligence; if he is melancholy, he is grieving at the supremacy of the established power. Nay, to make the parallel complete, we have recently learnt to call praises as "seditious silence" and "culpable expectation." So that no caution, no abnegation of publicity, can avert suspicion. Quidvis mihi cavendum est, nemo tamen fuit suspicax. For the sake of France and the world, we hope that this dark phase of history will be but temporary, and that the Emperor's good sense will soon sweep away a system which threatens to bring so many troubles on a great people.

NEW YORK, April 2.

The steamer Hammonia arrived here last night, and brought a London evening express of the 20th March, and Loudon morning papers of the same day.

INDIA.

The Bombay mail arrived at London on Saturday morning but details of news a give little interest in addition to the full telegraphic despatches already published.

A letter from Allahabad of the 11th says:—The wh le force is to be in motion to-morrow they have been crossing the river at Cawnpore for the last few days, and talk of the attack beginning on the 20th

Sir Colin Campbell has had an interview with the Governor General concerning Oude affairs.

There is a report here that a relation of the Old King has proclaimed himself King of India, and has given orders to the insurgents not to fight us, but to disperse in bands of forty or fifty, and scour round and kill the English.

Further intelligence from India says that Marin Singh has preserved and sent from Lucknow some 40 or 50 English or Anglo Indian men, women, and children, some of whom had reached Gonchpore. Mairn Singh brought them as far as Fyzabad himself. He has asked Jung Bahadoor for a pass into Nepaul to end his days in retirement.

The Bareilly rebels lost 500 killed and wounded, and three guns, in the affairs of the 10th of February.

The Malon contingent, of which the greater part has mutinied, is to be formally disbanded.

The Fort of Gurrakhota had been abandoned by the rebels, and demolished by the English.

A rebel attack on the village of Sheemanbad, had been repulsed.

Capt. Osborne and the Rajah of Rewa had captured the Fort of Bigregoorghur and 94 prisoners. The prisoners were all shot.

The Calpee rebels had been twice beaten, losing in both affairs—over 200 killed. A small government post at Tulluwam had sustained an attack of several hours, though only ten men defended it. The assailters then moved off taking with them the wives and children of the defenders who were in the village.

No change to note in the Bombay export market.

FRANCE.

The Paris Patrie announces that several small vessels are now arriving in different ports to reinforce the French Admiral in China.

TURKEY.

The Augsburg Gazettes says that France and England are agreed upon the following points:—1st, that the Porte must suppress the insurrection in Bosnia and Herzegovina. 2nd, it must faithfully execute the Hatte Hownyoun. Should these requisitions be complied with, it will not be necessary to consult the Paris Conference on the subject. Otherwise the Conference will be formally called on to settle the question.

The China mail was expected at London on the 22nd.

MONEY MARKET.

Consols closed on Saturday at two p. m. at 96¾ for money, and 96¾ to 97 for 8th April. At Paris on Saturday, the three per cents. closed at 69¾, an improvement of about ¼ per cent.

Value of Indian Corn.

For the following interesting information in regard to this little understood kind of food, we are indebted to Hunt's Merchant's Magazine:

By those who do not know, or are too scientific to profit by the experience of nations, of men and herds of fat cattle, Indian corn, rice, buckwheat, &c., are only considered good fodder. Leibeg states that if we were to go naked as the Indians, or if we were subjected to the same degree of cold as the Samoides, we should be able to consume the half of a dozen candles in a single meal. Daring excessive fatigue in temperatures, wheat flour fails to sustain the system. This is owing to a deficiency in the elements necessary to supply animal heat, and the strong desire for oleaginous substances under these circumstances, has led to the belief that animal food is necessary for human support. But late scientific experiments, and a better acquaintance with the habits of the North American Indians, have shown that a vegetable oil answers the same purpose as animal food: that one pound of purchase Indian corn, or an equal quantity of corn meal, made into bread, is more than equivalent to two pounds of fat meat. Meal from Indian corn contains four times as much oleaginous matter as wheat flour; more starch, and consequently capable of producing more sugar, and though less glutinous, in other important components is considerably nearly as much nitrogenous material. The combination of elements very compounds in Indian corn renders it alone the mixed diet capable of sustaining men under the most extraordinary circumstances. In it there is a natural conference of elementary principles, which constitutes the basis of organic life, that exists in no other vegetable production. In ultimate composition, in nutritious properties, in digestibility, and in its adaptation to the varied necessities of animal life in the different climates of the earth, corn meal is capable of supplying more of the absolute wants of the adult human system than any other single substance in nature.

The Canadian Confederacy.

The proposed confederacy of all the British colonies in North America would consist of six provinces and three territories, as follows:

	Square miles	Population
Canada East	201,969	890,261
Canada West	148,932	952,004
New Brunswick	27,700	193,800
Newfoundland	35,913	130,000
Nova Scotia	18,746	276,117
Prince Edward's Island	2,134	62,678
Total	435,514	2,470,160
Hudson's Bay territory	2,430,000	100,000
Labrador	5,000	100,000
Vancouver Island	8,000	2,000
Totals	6,968,514	2,758,400

The extent of territory is nearly equal to that of the entire United States, and although the climate in general is severe, yet the soil in many vast regions is very rich and productive, and there can be no doubt that the new empire or republic, as the case may be, would become a mighty power of the American continent. It is probable, too, that such a movement would lead to a rapid improvement of the western portion of North America, as the manner in the greater part of the possessions of the Hudson Bay Com any, especially in Oregon, near Puget's sound and at Vancouver's Island, are remarkably mild and genial.—Washington Union.

Tomatoes.

A correspondent of the Genesee Farmer gives this mode of growing tomatoes. He forwards his plants in a hot-bed or green-house, and grows them in pots until they are a foot or a foot and a half high, turning them out about the second week in May. He then sets three feet apart in rows. When planted he drives down a few stakes, six or eight feet apart, leaving them four feet high the whole length of the rows, and nailing a strip of wood all along the tops, and tying one or two lower down the stakes to make a trellis. The ground should be dug deep and made rich with manure, and a spoonful of guano mixed with the soil under each root. We quote: "When they have grown sufficiently long to tie to the trellis, I select two or three of the longest shoots and tie them loosely to the trellis, cutting away all other small laterals which may grow on the main branches. I let these main branches grow until they have come in flower and set the first bunch of fruit; then I pinch out the top one joint above the bunch, and so on of all the rest, taking care to cut all the laterals which may grow on the main branches down to the axels of the leaves, as often as they are produced, but leaving the leaves entire. If any one will take this little extra trouble, he will be amply repaid and absolutely astonished at the immense clusters of fine large tomatoes he will have. If lanted in a favorable situation, they will ripen at least as early as those grown in any other way out of doors, and frequently three days or a week earlier. When ripe they will hang longer on the vines without decay. The situation can hardly be too sunny. Deep, light, loamy soil suits them best."

Ancient Uses of Cork.

There are some substances in the use of which we have not made much progress, partly from the fact that other materials have been discovered to supply their place, and partly from the substance itself possessing such palpable peculiarities that its earliest discoverers must have seen at once for what it was most applicable. This is the case with Cork. The Romans used it as soles to put it in their shoes, to keep their feet dry; and as there were no high heels in those days, the ladies used it to make them appear tall. Pliny has seen the Gauls fish with the aid of a cork jacket, fishermen used it as floats on their nets, and buoys to their anchors, and Pliny tells us that it was employed as stoppers to vessels of all kinds. The old Spaniards lined the walls of their houses with Cork, because it kept them warm and prevented dampness; and lastly, the Egyptians manufactured coffins out of it, which being lined with a resinous composition, preserved their dead from decay. The method employed in Portugal of cutting the bark, and burning the outside, is the same to-day as it was one thousand years ago: so that altogether, we cannot say that we have done very much with Cork that has not been done before.—Scientific American.

Tobacco in California.

There were fourteen and a half acres planted with tobacco in California last year in four different counties, and the crop in one county amounted to 1000 pounds. The tobacco raised in Los Angelos county was good, and no doubt the State might supply the home demand with good tobacco. The tobacco produced, on good soil, from 2000 to 3000 pounds per acre, and has sold at from twenty-five to thirty cents per pound.

The Welland Assizes.

THE CAYUGA AND PORT ROBINSON MURDERS.

Robert Flanders sworn.—I know Townsend well. I first heard of the murder of Nellis on the day after the murder; I was then at Cayuga station, where I reside. The news was brought to me between eleven and twelve in the day; Townsend came to my house about ten o'clock on the night of the murder; George Gibson brought him there; four others came with him; they remained until between two and three in the morning, when they left to go to the station. I was sworn in by Mr. Fitch as a special constable, and some constables came from Cayuga; I and the others, six or seven in number, immediately went to Buffalo; we heard the men were at the United States hotel; but after searching the city for some time we returned without discovering them. I eventually arrested Blowes at Hamilton from the knowledge I possessed of him, and I had only seen him once—that was at my house on the night of the murder. King was in gaol for robbery, and I went to the prisoner and at once recognised him, though I had only seen him once before. Mr. Heward had searched Toronto for Bryson, but had been unable to find him: I suspected he was with his grandfather at Innisfil, and we went there, and arrested him whilst he was in bed. We had the last news of Townsend at Buffalo, but when we arrested his accomplices they told us they had taken the Niagara train; we returned home on Friday night, and on Sunday evening I heard that Townsend and Lettice had been in Pelham on the Friday before. We searched for him both there, at Oswego, at Syracuse, at Rock Island, and on the Missouri River; I had scent of him until I got into the State of Missouri, when I lost him. I heard of the arrest of the prisoner shortly after he was taken into custody; I received a telegram from Mr. Iles, requesting me to meet him at Port Colborne; I went to Port Colborne and saw Iles there; he asked me if I knew Townsend; I told him I did perfectly well; he then said, "describe him." I gave him some little description, but it did not amount to much, as I wanted to hear Iles's description; I asked him the colour of Townsend's eyes; Iles replied they were blue; "then," I said, "he is not the man;" he then said the eyes might be of a very dark blue or grey colour, for he had not noticed them particularly. he asked me if I recollected Townsend having any scars about his face. I replied I never recollected seeing any; he (Iles) then said there was a large scar on the man's cheek, but he thought it at it had been done fresh, as there was a patch upon it; there or four persons were present at the time. I had the impression that Townsend had a small scar in the forehead, near the hair, but his mother afterwards told me that he had a scar also in him, and what had been taken for a small spur was only a little cowlicks. Iles also said there was a very small scar over the eye; I told Iles, if the prisoner was William Townsend, he must have received the scars since he had left: Iles desired me to go and see him; I told him I was certain the prisoner was not the man, and I told him if he would pay my expenses to Cleveland and back, I would go; he offered to do so, and promised me a share of the reward, if he got it, and he seemed to be pretty sure of it at that time. I rather think he said I should have two-thirds of the reward; he was pretty liberal at that time; he always maintained that he knew Townsend well. When we arrived at Cleveland, we went to Iles's, from thence to the police office, where we saw the Marshall, and we went next to the gaol: the gaoler and I went into the passage above a flat upon which we left Iles; the gaoler had told Iles he had not better go up, as the prisoner felt a little vicious towards him; the door was locked upon us, and Iles could not possibly have come up; when the gaoler pointed out the prisoner, I said, "Is this the man they have arrested for Townsend?"—he replied, "Yes." I then said, "I have seen enough of him—it is not Townsend." The prisoner and I conversed but very little together. I think the first question he asked me was whether I was from Canada; I told him I was; he asked if I had come to re-gain him as Townsend?—I replied in the affirmative, but I told him it was not the man: that was nearly all the conversation we had together. When we returned, I found Iles with the man who had accompanied us to the prisoner; I told Iles so; he did not say anything just then, but he afterwards desired me to keep still about it, because he was afraid if the man got out, he might shoot him: on the same evening, the Sheriff requested me to give him a description of Townsend; I at once sat down and wrote it, and I believe I signed it: that was at the police office; we had, in the meantime, gone back to Iles's house; from Iles's house I went at me to the police office, and gave the description: Iles did not know I was about to give a description of Townsend to the Marshall; in fact, I did not know I was wanted to do so myself, until we arrived at the station; I did not go there on purpose to give the description; I publicly stated my opinion that the prisoner was not Townsend; before going to the Court House it struck me that the prisoner might be a man who was charged with having committed a robbery at St. Catherines; I at once telegraphed, and received a description of him by telegraph: the description corresponded with the prisoner's appearance in several respects; but it was evident the prisoner could not be him inasmuch as the rubber was marked by small pox. When I went to the Court House, it was said there was a man there from Canada, and they were afraid to show him; it was also reported that I was a brother-in-law of Townsend, and the prosecuting Attorney had the investigation put off a week on that account: after the postponement of the examination, Mr. Jones who was acting as an Attorney on behalf of the prisoner, came to me in Court and asked me if I knew Townsend; I replied I did, but the prisoner was not he: Mr. Jones then desired me to remain until the following Saturday, but I told him I could not, as I was busy at home getting in wood; Mr. Jones and the prosecuting Attorney then took me before a gentleman whom I understood to be the United States Commissioner, and to him I made a statement on oath, in which I described the prisoner and also Townsend: I did this about noon on the day after my arrival at Cleveland. I do not know that Iles was aware I was about to make the statement; I did not keep at Iles's that night, but I stayed on Saturday; it was arranged by the Attorneys on both sides that my evidence should be taken in the way I have stated: I was cross-questioned very closely; I stated then what I say now—that it was impossible for the prisoner to be Townsend, and when my evidence had been given, every one present appeared to be of the same opinion; I returned to Iles's and took tea, after which Iles accompanied me to the depot. I had no object in keeping the making of affidavits secret from him; it was generally understood by the people who remained in the Court after the adjournment took place, that I was about to make an affidavit; it is very possible that Iles might not have been present when that arrangement took place. Afterwards saw an inquiry made in the Welland Herald, why I did not identify the prisoner as Townsend, when I must have known him, this and other statements induced me to make the Buffalo Express an offer of a wager of one thousand dollars 'that the prisoner was not Townsend: no one took up the bet, but I made then five dollar bets, and they are outstanding yet; I am not related to him, and the only connection between us is this—a half uncle of his married a cousin of mine; Townsend is not a companion of mine; he used to come to my public house, but he always behaved very well in my presence, he used to play a little upon the fiddle, and make so terrible a noise upon the violin when he came to my house that my wife threatened to burn it. There was a very slight suspicion against him of being a thief before the murder took place, but nothing had been stated against him. I asked his stepfather how he lived; he said he could not at all tell—and I knew as well as he, he never paid took of a meal's meat in my house; he teazed the girls in the kitchen, and the last time he was seen there, one of the girls broke the "dipper" about his head. I am still of the opinion that the prisoner is not Townsend.

Cross-examined by Mr. Macdonald—I was instrumental in getting a number of Townsend's accomplices arrested.

Mr. Macdonald—It is said you permitted Townsend to escape. Now, sir, how much reward did you get as blood-money when these men were executed?

Witness—I received about £150.

Mr. Macdonald—You got the £150 as blood-money!

Cross-examination continued—I swear positively that I did not tell Iles before I saw the prisoner, that Townsend had two scars—one upon his left brow and the other under his cheek. Blowes and King were executed some time in May, 1853; I recollect being in old Mr. Nellis's house afterwards; Mr. W. Nellis, the father, and James C. Nellis, and Samuel Nellis, the brothers of the murdered man, were present; I never said in their presence that Townsend had a scar over the brow; I never told Mr. Cheshire, while the Cayuga trial was proceeding, that there was a mistake about the matter, and that Townsend had scars upon his face, which I could point out. I do not think I had any conversation with Mr. Cheshire at all.

Re-examined by Mr. Freeman—I never supposed Townsend had any mark upon his forehead, with the exception of the cow-lick, which I have referred to; in one of the descriptions, it was said that Townsend had a scar on his forehead.

The Court adjourned at eight o'clock.

EIGHTH DAY (SATURDAY).

Mr. Justice McLean took his seat on the bench at eight o'clock, this morning.

Mr. Freeman commenced by the examination of Captain Agnew Patrick Farrell—I knew a person named Thomas Graham. Garret Patterson was brought before me the latter end of October, 1854, charged with being concerned in the murder of Mr. Nellis. Graham was examined as a witness, and my impression is that he swore as positively to Patterson being one of the gang that he was committed for trial. There was so strong an alibi made out that I should have discharged Patterson without hesitation were it not for Graham's testimony; I first saw the prisoner when he was sent up to our gaol in June, 1857; I mailed two letters for him; I know how they were addressed; one was addressed to Mr. J. Anderson, Recording Scribe Sons of Temperance; the other was addressed to Mr. Thomas Gray, Foster's Barn, Yuba County, California. I had gone to the gaol at the prisoner's request; he complained of his detention in gaol, and conceived it impossible so many people would so far perjure themselves as to swear he was Townsend; I advised him to write to his friends in California; he said it would do him no service as the people of the place were roving people like himself and the letters would never get to hand; I almost censured him for not writing, and at last he did so; I endorsed his letters, paid the postage, registered and posted them.

Isaac Pilling—I reside in the State of Wisconsin, and have been in California; I left New York on the 5th April, 1853, and arrived at San Francisco on the 6th May; I then went to French Corrile; I went to Chip's Diggings about the 1st August, 1853, and left on the last of March, 1857; I returned to my native place in Lafyette County, Wisconsin; I saw the prisoner; I first saw him on the 21st July, 1854; I saw him in Davidson's Restaurant, Chip's Flats; when I saw the prisoner in gaol, I did not recognize him until I had conversed with him a little; I asked him what time the law-suit was commenced by the Gas Tunnel Company against the Wilkinson Company. He answered me correctly, and detailed a variety of minute circumstances connected with it; he also asked me if I remembered a span of horses running away on the flat, and killing a person named Abby, who lived with Elisha Barnes. He brought himself to my recollection by the fact that I was passing between Andrew's and Fuller's store when the prisoner and James Anderson told me of this accident; the man was killed in October or November, 1854; I remember him as early as July by seeing him in Davidson's restaurant, arguing with a man who went by the name of "Scotty." I know it was about July I saw the prisoner, from the fact that I had just returned from French Corrille, and had gone into the restaurant in time to hear the argument between "Scotty" and the prisoner. I remember seeing Mr. Huber, Mr. Aikins, and Mr. Walters there. I do not remember what the prisoner talked about.—"Scotty's" correct name with Andrew Smith; he was employed as a cook and baker. I did not know a man there named Henry. After I had seen the prisoner the first time, I think I stated to some one that he was not the man I had in my mind. It was on the second visit I had the conversation with, and re ognized, the prisoner.—when in California, the prisoner went by the name of "Bob." I have a letter which was sent to me by Mr. Barker, the prisoner's attorney. That letter brought me here. [Witness handed the letter to Mr. Freeman.] The letter was brought to me from the place to which it had been mailed. I was not promised a reward for coming here.—I came here of my own free will and accord.

Mr. Freeman read a portion of the letter, which, however, was not received as evidence. It was as follows:

"Dunnsville, C. W., March 6, 1858.

DEAR SIR,—I write you at the instance of Frank J. Huber, recently from California. I am acting as the attorney of one Robert McHenry who is arrested as Wm. Townsend for murder! The murders were committed in October and November 1854. and Huber says that you are acquainted with McHenry, and can give evidence as to his having been engaged on the Wilkinson Tunnel and on Balsam Flat, at or about the same time. Huber will attend and give his evidence, but as some 20 persons swear positively to his (McH.) being Townsend. I will require your evidence and that of John and Henry Weirs and James L. Thompson, before I have any confidence in his acquittal. I cannot at present promise you anything for your attendance, but think I will be able to raise a sufficient sum by subscription to defray your expenses."

"I hope this appeal to you will not be in vain; you have it in your power to assist in saving the life of an innocent man, whose greatest crime appears to be that he is without money, to prove his innocence, while those who are urging the prosecution, have the certainty of a reward of $7,000 if they succeed in having him convicted as William Townsend. His trial takes place at Merrittville, near this place, on the 24th of this present month, so you will have to start immediately on receipt of this. I send this letter enclosed—one to the Postmaster, requesting him to cause its immediate delivery, as no time is to be lost. If I had known of your place of residence, I would have written you before, but I only received Huber's letter to-day.

"Come without fail. McHenry is innocent, and it is hard to see a man executed because of his poverty. You will not regret having come, when you witness the vile conduct of those who are looking forward to the reward as their recompense.

"Yours, most obed'tly,

"EDGAR BARKER,

"Attorney-at-Law.

"ISAAC PILLING, Esq."

Examination continued,—I am certain about the period when I saw the prisoner at California.

Cross-examined by Mr. Macdonald.—I arrived at Merrittville the day before the Court opened. I saw the prisoner the next day. None of the other Californian witnesses had at that time arrived. Mr. Freeman and Mr. Carrie, were present at the interview. I only remained there a few minutes. We did not recognize each other. The Gas Company as well as the Wilkinson Company, had a dispute with the Wilkinson Company. He knew all about the Gas Company's suit. He never mentioned my name, and did not show any sign of recognizing me. On the following day Mr. Huber, Mr. Aikins, Mr. Walters, and myself, went into the cell together, in company with Mr. Barker. Before going into the cell I had conversed with them about the prisoner. I might have told them on my first visit I did not recognize the prisoner. When we went into the goal on the second occasion, Mr. Huber then asked the prisoner if he could not recollect circumstances about Chip's Flats. I had gone to the goal in the first instance expecting to see another man. The man I refer to as being killed, met with the accident in October or November. I know at was at that period, because I was then getting out my timber, and the prisoner and the other man first told me of it. When the prisoner related the substance of that conversation to me, the remembrance of him at once flashed across my mind. I did not know Henry of Forest City. I have told Mr. Glover, of the City Hotel, Merrittville, that the man I had in my mind as "Bob," had sandy whiskers and sandy hair, and that he was a thick-set man. I know Mr. Campbell, Deputy Sheriff of Detroit. I do not think I told Mr. Campbell that I did not remember having seen the prisoner in California, but that from the circumstances he had mentioned, I was positive he had been in California. I recollect Mr. Springer, in the presence of myself and others, describing a McHenry, whom he had seen near Chip's Flats, as being a thick-set man, and having light hair and sand, whiskers; but I do not know that any of the company said he had described Henry exactly; nor do I remember Springer saying that his name was not Henry but McHenry. "Scotty" and the prisoner were pretty "gassy, whenever I saw them together. I had three or four interviews with the p isoner in gaol.

Re-examined by Mr. Freeman—At the dinner table, Springer described a man whom he named accidenry, and whom in said he knew. None of us said that that accidenry was the man whom we knew.

Hugh Aikins.—I reside at Nassagaway. I have been at Chip's Flats, California. I left my father's house in January, 1854 and arrived at Chip's Flats in June, 1854. I was there engaged with Walters and others in ditching. I arrived here in October, 1857, having left on the 5th of September. Mr. Walters came over with me We brought papers with us. I first saw the prisoner about the middle of October, 1857. He was then at David on's house at Chip's Flats. I know it was at that period, because I was then engaged on the flumes of the ditch. When I first saw the prisoner in gaol I recognized his features but I could not for a little time say who he I had seen him. He at once recognized me, and called me Hugh Walters. The reason he called me Walters was, that in 1854 I was generally known by the name o. Walters. During my first interview with the prisoner in gaol, I called to mind the circumstances under which I had seen him In November I moved down to Chip's Flats. The pr

Simpson Nelles.—I recollect Mr. Flanders coming to our house after the execution of Blowers and King. He said Townsend had a scar over the left eye, and added, "You might meet him and talk to him and not observe it if he had his hat on; but if you knew the scar was there you would see it quite plainly." He said nothing about a cowhick. He might have alluded to other scars; but I cannot exactly remember.

Cross-examined by Mr. Freeman.—I positively swear Flanders said the scar was over the left eye. I cannot tell the exact spot to which he pointed with his finger.

Re-examined by Mr. Macdonald—I do not believe that he pointed to the root of the hair.

William W. Nelles—William Flanders called at my place shortly after the execution of King and Blowers. I am not sure that my family were present. When I had the conversation with him he called to see about a reward I had offered for the apprehension of the murderer. He said that he had good success. I (W. Nelles) remarked that we had all but Townsend. He said he knew him and that he had a scar over his eye. I then paid him the reward. I don't remember any particulas eye. We were conversing inside the house. My sons came in about the time Flanders was going away. I am not sure whether he said scar or scars. I think "scar" He put his hand to the place. I think my sons were talking to him on the verandah. I did not follow them out.

Cross-examined by Mr. Freeman.—I think he did not say "his forehead over the eye." He only mentioned it once in my presence in the house.

Andrew Oliphant.—I live at the West End of Lundy's Lane, and am a Blacksmith. I know Benjamin Duffin. He used to live in Pelham. I knew William Townsend, either in 1851 or 1852. I think 1852. I have seen him before that—I saw him at Mr. Duffin's frequently, working in the Cooper business. I was buying coal at Joseph Garner's. I remember his having a handkerchief over his eye, on account of a hurt he had received.

Mr. Freeman objected to this evidence being received, as it was not rebutting testimony.

Mr. Macdonald said he desired to prove by this witness, that the prisoner received a wound over the eye at a particular time, and that the wound left a scar after it. He only heard of this witness after the case for the Crown had been closed. Had he heard about him earlier, he would have commanded his attendance before.

The Judge ruled that the evidence could not now be received.

Mr. Macdonald desired his Lordship to note the fact that he had tendered such testimony and that it had been refused.

His Lordship did so.

Mr. Macdonald then proposed to show by the witness, that Townsend had a few days afterwards a scar over his eye, and that Duffin must have seen it.

Mr. Freeman said this would only be confirmatory evidence of what had already been given for the Crown. Mr. Macdonald could only contradict certain words used by Duffin, or show that to the knowledge of the witness Mr. Duffin was aware of the scar.

Witness was interrogated and said he could not state that Duffin knew of the scar.

James Chambers.—When the examination was going on at Cleveland, I understood Aaron Farr to say, that Townsend had a scar over the left eye.

B. T. Campbell.—I am Deputy Sheriff of Detroit. I am here on business. I came here on Monday week. On the Tuesday or Wednesday afternoon afterwards, Mr. Pilling, who has been called as a witness for the prisoner in answer to my question, if he had recognized the prisoner as the man whom he had seen in California, said he did not recollect having seen him in California: but the prisoner brought to his mind circumstances that he knew to have transpired in California.

Charles Glover proprietor of the City Hotel.—Mr. Pilling stopped at my house during one day. He said he knew a man named "Bob" in California—he could not distinctly recollect whether his surname was McHenry or not. He was a thick-set man, having light hair and sandy whiskers.

Mr. Freeman.—Pilling said he knew two men named "Bob."

Sayres S. Hagar—I know Valentine Schram. I called upon him, and asked him to go to Merittville to see if he could identify the prisoner. He rather objected to going, and went on to give me a description of Townsend, saying he had small black eyes, high cheek bones, thin cheeks and long sharp chin. He particularly spoke on Townsend having a scar over his eye; but I cannot say he mentioned which eye it was over. He did however, go to Merittville.

Cross-examined by Mr. Freeman—Mr. Schram is a respectable man. I should say he must have been mistaken in saying he did not tell me.

Nancy Crumb—I live about a mile and a half from Bridgeport. I know William Harvey. He resides near to the Townsend family at Cayuga. When I was present, Harvey, on one occasion after Townsend had left the neighbourhood, said in my house, that Townsend had changed his name, and he was now called McHenry.—My eldest son Benjamin was present. I do not know who else was present. He told me that long before the prisoner was arrested.

Mr. Macdonald—But he is Townsend in disguise.

William Talkett—I am a sailor and reside at Cleveland. I know the prisoner. He was on board the schooner St. Lawrence, in the spring of 1852, on the waters of Lake Erie. He came on board in April. I was the mate. The prisoner remained on board a month and a half. I was examined at Cleveland on behalf of the prisoner. He went by the name of "Bob." They called him an American, but on one occasion I asked him what countryman he was, and he said he was an Englishman. I thought he talked like an Englishman.

Cross-examined by Mr. Freeman.—He never changed his tone, which was natural. I do not know whether he came from a place within the sound of "Bow Bells." or "Blue Bells." (Laughter.) He told me when he left he was going on board the Powhattan.

Kenneth Mackenzie.—I was born in the north of Scotland. I have conversed with the prisoner, who has told me he lived some distance from the city of Glasgow. I got the impression of a few miles. He told me that he had sailed down the Clyde, and had left Greenock for this country. That is a port a man would ship from if he left Glasgow.

Mr. Macdonald wished witness to state something more that had passed between the prisoner and himself, but Mr. Freeman objected.

Prisoner then leant over the desk, and said he was willing to answer any question suggested to him.

Mr. Macdonald.—I understood you were very morose, and would not answer any questions?

Prisoner—You will understand a little more before you die.

Mr. Macdonald.—What did you say?

Prisoner—You will understand a little more before you die.

Mr. Macdonald (vehemently)—I have no doubt the whole tribe of you will try to injure me in every way; but I defy you all. You meant that as a threat.

Prisoner—I did not.

Mr. Macdonald said he had just discovered the existence of the next witness.

John Devine (brought hither by a Bench warrant)—I was present, eleven years ago, when Townsend met with an accident at Thorold. He was kicked by a horse on the left cheek. He drove the horse himself. The name of the horse was "Old Spot." Blood flowed from the wound. Townsend was taken, senseless, into a grocery store, by myself and a Dutchman named Dornan, who was working for Owen McMann at Port Dalhousie. [A subpœna was issued for Dornan's attendance.] I left Townsend in care of Dornan. I saw Townsend again two weeks afterwards. The grocery is situated near Ban's Mill, on the old canal. I knew the man's name was Townsend.

Cross-examined by Mr. Freeman.—The accident happened before the new locks were built.

Mr. Freeman—Have you not said the man's eyes were black?

Witness—Who told you, your Honour? (Laughter.)

Mr. Freeman—Can you write?

Witness—Yes, your Honour. (To the Judge)—If your Lordship will give me a pen I will show you. (Laughter.) I never wrote a letter describing the man's eyes as being black.

Mr. Freeman proposed to cross-examine the witness, to prove that the wounded man was not the prisoner.

The Judge ruled that the counsel could only cross-examine upon the matters rising out of the examination in chief, but his Lordship pointed Mr. Freeman's application.

Examination continued.—The letter now shown me is not in my handwriting. I write better than that.

Robert Harper—I reside in the township of Wainfleet, on the line of the canal, and knew William Townsend. I remember his being kicked by a spotted horse on the canal Bank. I saw him about a half an hour after he was hurt; John Devine and a man who went by the name of 'Dutch' carried him off afterwards; the kick was received on the left cheek just here (placing his finger on his left cheek bone); I do not know who dressed the wounds; he was taken to the city hotel, Thorold; the building is not far distant from Ban's mill; it was either eleven or twelve years ago—I think it was twelve years since; I did not know Townsend previous to that; but I frequently saw him afterwards; I saw the plaster on the wound after it was getting better. The wound could be seen on Townsend's face by looking straight in the face; it was very easy to see it; I did myself to prevent coming here—I was afraid to come.

Mr. Macdonald—That is the case with all our witnesses, and a very pretty state of things it is.

—Springer—I reside at Delaware, in the county of Middlesex; I have lived at California; I left Missouri river on the 19th June, 1849, and arrived at California in the month of February, 1850; I passed through Chip's Diggings in 1851; I was last in Forest City in 1852; I left California in September, 1856, and back by way of Nicaragua; I knew a man at Forest City of the name of McHenry; I saw him on Beaver River, between it and Yuba county, 65 miles from Forest City; he was a low sized man, having middling light brown hair, and was about five feet seven inches; he stood erect; his complexion was light; he was a butcher; I described the man to the California witnesses, and one of them said I had described a man of the name of McHenry, whom they also knew.

Mrs. Alpheus Sherwood—I have had a short conversation with Capt. Turnbull; Capt. Turnbull said if the lawyers only knew what questions to put to him he could throw more light on this matter than had been thrown upon it yet; he said Mr. Darling, of Dunville, had telegraphed to him that his expenses would be paid; but he did not say it would be worse if his costs were not paid.

Cross-examined by Mr. Freeman—Captain Turnbull boarded with us.

Mr. Macdonald proposed to show by a man who measured Townsend for some clothes that he saw a scar under his chin, but it was objected to, and the evidence was not received.

F. W. Cheshire—In my presence at Cayuga, during the trial, Robert Flanders said to me, "The scars these parties have mentioned are all wrong; I know Townsend, and the scars upon him are different."

Dr. Burns—George Schram has said in Court, in my presence, on seeing the prisoner more, "There I see Townsend;" and when the prisoner again moved by said: "There I don't see Townsend."

Robert Coulter—I have several times talked to John Nelson O'Brien, and he has often told me that he could not swear whether the prisoner was or was not Townsend."

Abisha R. Crosman was then called by Mr. Freeman, and produced the book containing the entry he had referred to during the afternoon; he submitted the book to the inspection of the Judge, and was cross-examined respecting it by Mr. Macdonald, who endeavoured to show that it had been manufactured for the purpose.

Mr. Macdonald wished to call two or three additional witnesses, but said he could not bring them until Monday, and as he intended to make a speech of several hours' duration, it would be well to adjourn the Court.

His Lordship hoped the Jury would reconcile themselves as well as they could to their prolonged captivity.

A Juryman said he had not taken off his clothes for eight days, nor slept for two nights past.

The Judge hoped the Jury would be as well cared for as possible, and gave the permission to attend Church on the following day; and also to taking a walk in the custody of a constable.

It is impossible to give an idea of the feverish anxiety which pervaded the whole Court, as this long to be remembered trial drew near its termination. Messengers were despatched in every direction to search up and bring in witnesses to contradict the testimony which had been given for the prisoner, and when at a quarter after seven o'clock, the Court adjourned, the Grand Jury room, which had hitherto been kept crowded with witnesses, was completely deserted.

The prisoner manifested but little more emotion on Saturday than he has hitherto evinced; he chatted very familiarly with Mr. Jones, his Cleveland attorney and the California witnesses; the greater part of his time has been spent in reading the newspaper reports of his own trial. Public feeling appears to be rapidly turning in his favour.

The Court again sits at eight o'clock on Monday morning.

THE SPEECH FOR THE CROWN.

Mr. Macpherson addressed the court on the behalf of the prosecution. He commenced by apologizing for making a very short address on account of illness. He had never yet felt called upon to address the jury upon the evidence brought forward for the defence, but it would be affectation were he to say that the evidence in this case did not call for remark. The duty of the prosecuting counsel was not to indulge in declamatory language, but to take the position of a coroner on and see that every and single fact was done in the manner. If the prisoner was found innocent of the charge by his country he would be perfectly satisfied. Mr. Macdonald, but if he was the murderer of Constable Richards, then it was only a very proper wish that he might be brought to justice. He commenced his address by congratulating the jury upon the ability that the had manifested; for he knew in regard that the learned gentleman who had just addressed the court charged the crown with not having dealt fairly with the prisoner on this occasion. It was necessary to get up a new and cement in order to give it a more lasting one to the satisfaction of the jury whether the prisoner was Townsend or not, and if he was not Townsend let him get forth to the world, though he were screened to the lips in blood. His learned friend said he was secured of the innocence of the prisoner, he had chosen an intelligent jury to try the case, confident of their acting fairly and impartially and without feeling a d—d sympathy—The witnesses had been ordered out of court: but the prosecution had laboured under this disadvantage—that the witnesses for the defence had had ample opportunities of hearing the evidence as it appeared from day to day in the public newspapers. His learned friend had complained of the statement of Mr. Harrison, a young gentleman of singular talent and application, and who would one day be a bright ornament to his profession. Mr. Harrison had said that the prisoner was one of the criminals, and perhaps when he arrived at the age of Mr. Harrison he would be more inclined, though it was not a little strange that Mr. Freeman fell into the same error, if error it was—by a seeming his conviction of the prisoner's innocence. If the jury had a reasonable belief that the prisoner was not William Townsend then it would be their duty to set him at liberty—him, but he hoped the jury would not, as had been the case at Cayuga, come to a lame and impotent conclusion and disagree. The crown had brought forward all the evidence they could produce at the present time; the defence had also done their best, and it would be satisfactory to both sides if the jury could possibly come to a conclusion one way or the other. His learned friend had commented somewhat severely upon the statement of Mr. Harrison, that the prisoner could, if convicted, receive a new trial; but, not only would a new trial be granted him should he adduce reasons to justify it, but if the prisoner was transported for the rest of the gallows, and there was a doubt of his guilt, would he not also come forward and prove by his past life that he was not Townsend, there would be an immediate reprieve. Whilst addressing the jury he should frequently have occasion to refer to the evidence as reported in the public newspapers, and he took great pleasure in bearing testimony to the truthfulness, accuracy, and ability with which these reports had been given. It was something novel to people so remotely situated, to see the full and correct report of this case brought out day by day as the trial proceeded, and it spoke much for the energy and enterprise of the proprietors of the public journals, and the industry and ability of those who were connected with them. Beginning with the evidence of Mr. Gaynor, the learned counsel remarked that the "rowdy" lost worn by the murderer, fitted the head of the prisoner, and that, as Mr. Gaynor had stated, the prisoner must have had a very strong motive for concealing the particulars of his past history. Mrs Fleming had particularly marked the conduct of the man whom she had seen at the head of the table on the evening of the murder, and the testimony given by her and the others who saw the murderer on that occasion, was of the most satisfactory nature—Mr. McCoppin's evidence was important, and such as his learned friend had confessed, as was entitled to a great deal of weight. What was the previous history of the prisoner? Was it a fact that he had a past history? The Crown said he did not give his past history, because he had none. The only history known of him was that he was seen on the lakes and afterwards in California; but he should be prepared to show that the prisoner never went to California until after the murder of Constable. The jury would observe that whenever Townsend was seen, McHenry was unknown—the two never appeared together—there never were two Richmonds in the field. The prisoner's counsel had gone all the way to California to prove an alibi; but the Crown had given them an opportunity of proving an alibi at home, and which they might have done had they shown where Townsend was when the prisoner was in Sandusky gaol. Townsend was the coolest and most daring man known. Mark his unsurpassing coolness on the night of the murder, and afterwards when he was seen at Woodstock, and then turn to the prisoner at the bar, and see with what amazing coolness he had sat there reading the newspapers containing the accounts of his own trial. He never met but one man who could act with such coolness—he did not conceive there could be two such men, and his coolness afforded a very strong presumption that the prisoner and Townsend were one and the same. After going over other evidence, Mr. Macdonald came to that of Mr. Iles, whom he declared from the imputations cast upon him by Mr. Freeman, and said Mr. Iles's testimony had been corroborated in every important particular. With regard to the system of offering rewards, instead of being blamed for the course the government had taken in this respect, they were entitled to great credit. He then drew attention to the pistol, which, he said, bore the initials "C. T." This was an extraordinary thing, but he did not attach much importance to it, because he thought those letters were put on the pistol by the maker at the time the pistol was manufactured. It was singular, indeed, that the prisoner should have been detected with a revolver and three knives in his possession, when he had only thirteen cents in his pocket to protect. The presumption was that he had not armed himself to protect property which he possessed, but with an intent to take the property of others. Among other important features in this case was that of the prisoner calling Iles by name, and his considering him a friend. If this evidence could be believed to be true, it strongly went to show that the prisoner had previously known Mr. Iles, and that he considered him to be an old friend, and not the friend of a day, as had been suggested by the learned counsel on the other side. As to the diversity in the evidence respecting the colour of the hair and eyes, he attributed but little weight to it, it being so easy for persons to be deceived with regard to the hair and eyes. With respect to the feet, he knew many instances of people who, having contracted enlarged joints by wearing tight boots, had got rid of their deformity by wearing large soft boots. The witnesses had, many of them, differed on small points; but the very fact of their so differing showed that the evidence had not been concocted and made up. He now came to the evidence of George May and his father. George-May recognized Townsend at Chicago, but Townsend said he was no longer known by his proper name, but by a name which George May afterwards told his father, and which his father said was McHenry. This was very important when taken in connection with what Mr. Harvey told Nancy Crumb—that there was no longer a man named Townsend, but that he was now McHenry. He had no doubt the prisoner had been in California, and that he had written to Captain Turnbull; but he believed Capt. Turnbull had received a letter earlier than he had stated, or that it had been ante-dated. It was easy to be mistaken with regard to the forehead, and he regretted that before he (Mr. Macdonald) came up to Merrittville the prison's hair had been cut short, so that he could not be made to wear his hair as Townsend wore his. It was easy for him to pluck out his eyebrows, and there was no doubt the eyebrows of Townsend were more bushy at the time he committed the murder than were the eyebrows of the prisoner now; and the gaoler from Sandusky said the prisoner's eyebrows were not so bushy even now as they were when the prisoner was under his custody. All the witnesses on the part of the prosecution had found that Townsend was stoop shouldered; so was the prisoner, and the only difference between them was that the prisoner threw back his head more than Townsend; but what would a man not learn to do for the sake of saving dear life; in height the prisoner corresponded with Townsend, and though the prisoner was not strikingly like the Townsend family, still there was, as Mr. Hellems remarked, a resemblance between them. There was no room to doubt that the prisoner corrected Higgins about the sale of the boat; and it was a providential thing that a criminal could not always be on his guard, but that he occasionally suffered a word to escape to show who he really was. Speaking of the scars, he said it was impossible that in the wide world another man could be found having precisely the same scars, and if the evidence of the scars was positive and could be relied upon, the California evidence, that the prisoner was not Townsend, was worthless, and went for nothing. And he thought it had been satisfactorily shown that the scars had been described before the prisoner was taken into custody.—Barnes Watt had said before he saw the prisoner that if he was Townsend he would have a scar upon his foot. The prisoner's foot was bared, and there indeed was the very scar which had been described so circumstantially by Watt. As to the scar on the prisoner's cheek it had been stated by Devine and Harpef that Townsend was kicked by a horse on the canal near Thorold, but when Dornan was called to corroborate their evidence, it was evident from his manner that he had been tampered with and influenced, and he pretended that he knew nothing about the circumstance. It was most scathing comment upon the evidence for the defence that the gaoler at Sandusky and others who knew the prisoner, said they had never seen the convict's scar which he bore upon his face.—Coming to the California evidence, he said he did not think any great reliance could be placed upon it, however well-meaning the witnesses might be. He had no doubt they had seen the prisoner in California, but it was after he was seen by George May, and had gone to New Orleans. They were in all probability mistaken as to the time; but the witnesses for the prosecution could not have been mistaken respecting the scars. The evidence went to show that Townsend could transform to himself into almost any shape he chose, and as one any character he chose, and the counsel feared that the prisoner could also at all convenient opportunities metamorphise himself in any way—first he appeared as Townsend, the negro, next as McHenry, the cook—then as an American; anon as an Englishman; and at another time as a Scotchman. He then drew attention to the different ways in which the prisoner had spelt the name of McHenry. He could go through the whole of the evidence; but he did not wish to do so. If there was a doubt, by all means let the prisoner benefit by it, and rather run the risk of his deluging the country with blood than punish an innocent man. If the jury could not convince themselves that the prisoner was the man, let him go, be the consequences what they might. At all events they should so set that when they retired to their pillows they might be satisfied with their verdict, no matter what that verdict was. His learned friend had spoken of the prisoner's conduct as Cayuga, in saying that he was ready to stand upon his trial, although he was not prepared to meet the charge. That conduct did appear most extraordinary, and it could be accounted for only on the supposition that the prisoner had given him off as offering hoped the jury would not, as had been the case at Cayuga, come to a lame and impotent conclusion and disagree. The Crown had brought forward all the evidence they could produce at the present time; the defence had also done their best, and it would be satisfactory to both sides if the jury could possibly come to a conclusion one way or the other. His learned friend had commented somewhat severely upon the statement of Mr. Harrison, that the prisoner could, if convicted, receive a new trial; but, not only would a new trial be granted him should he adduce reasons to justify it, but if the prisoner was transported for the rest of the gallows, and there was a doubt of his guilt, would he not also come forward and prove by his past life that he was not Townsend, there would be an immediate reprieve. There was no room to doubt that the prisoner corrected Higgins about the sale of the boat; and it was a providential thing that a criminal could not always be on his guard, but that he occasionally suffered a word to escape to show who he really was. Speaking of the scars, he said it was impossible that in the wide world another man could be found having precisely the same scars, and if the evidence of the scars was positive and could be relied upon, the California evidence, that the prisoner was not Townsend, was worthless, and went for nothing. And he thought it had been satisfactorily shown that the scars had been described before the prisoner was taken into custody.—Barnes Watt had said before he saw the prisoner that if he was Townsend he would have a scar upon his foot. The prisoner's foot was bared, and there indeed was the very scar which had been described so circumstantially by Watt. As to the scar on the prisoner's cheek it had been stated by Devine and Harpef that Townsend was kicked by a horse on the canal near Thorold, but when Dornan was called to corroborate their evidence, it was evident from his manner that he had been tampered with and influenced, and he pretended that he knew nothing about the circumstance. It was most scathing comment upon the evidence for the defence that the gaoler at Sandusky and others who knew the prisoner, said they had never seen the convict's scar which he bore upon his face.—Coming to the California evidence, he said he did not think any great reliance could be placed upon it, however well-meaning the witnesses might be. He had no doubt they had seen the prisoner in California, but it was after he was seen by George May, and had gone to New Orleans. They were in all probability mistaken as to the time; but the witnesses for the prosecution could not have been mistaken respecting the scars. The evidence went to show that Townsend could transform to himself into almost any shape he chose, and as one any character he chose, and the counsel feared that the prisoner could also at all convenient opportunities metamorphise himself in any way—first he appeared as Townsend, the negro, next as McHenry, the cook—then as an American; anon as an Englishman; and at another time as a Scotchman. He then drew attention to the different ways in which the prisoner had spelt the name of McHenry. He could go through the whole of the evidence; but he did not wish to do so. If there was a doubt, by all means let the prisoner benefit by it, and rather run the risk of his deluging the country with blood than punish an innocent man. If the jury could not convince themselves that the prisoner was the man, let him go, be the consequences what they might. At all events they should so set that when they retired to their pillows they might be satisfied with their verdict, no matter what that verdict was. His learned friend had spoken of the prisoner's conduct at Cayuga, in saying that he was ready to stand upon his trial, although he was not prepared to meet the charge. That conduct did appear most extraordinary, and it could be accounted for only on the supposition that the prisoner had given him off as offering hoped the jury would not, as had been the case at Cayuga, come to a lame and impotent conclusion and disagree. The Crown had brought forward all the evidence they could produce at the present time; the defence had also done their best, and it would be satisfactory to both sides if the jury could possibly come to a conclusion one way or the other. His learned friend had commented somewhat severely upon the statement of Mr. Harrison, that the prisoner could, if convicted, receive a new trial; but, not only would a new trial be granted him should he adduce reasons to justify it, but if the prisoner was transported for the rest of the gallows, and there was a doubt of his guilt, would he not also come forward and prove by his past life that he was not Townsend, there would be an immediate reprieve. Whilst addressing the jury he should frequently have occasion to refer to the evidence as reported in the public newspapers, and he took great pleasure in bearing testimony to the truthfulness, accuracy, and ability with which these reports had been given. It was something novel to people so remotely situated, to see the full and correct report of this case brought out day by day as the trial proceeded, and it spoke much for the energy and enterprise of the proprietors of the public journals, and the industry and ability of those who were connected with them. Beginning with the evidence of Mr. Gaynor, the learned counsel remarked that the "rowdy" hat worn by the murderer, fitted the head of the prisoner, and that, as Mr. Gaynor had stated, the prisoner must have had a very strong motive for concealing the particulars of his past history. Mrs Fleming had particularly marked the conduct of the man whom she had seen at the head of the table on the evening of the murder, and the testimony given by her and the others who saw the murderer on that occasion, was of the most satisfactory nature—Mr. McCoppin's evidence was important, and such as his learned friend had confessed, as was entitled to a great deal of weight. What was the previous history of the prisoner? Was it a fact that he had a past history? The Crown said he did not give his past history, because he had none. The only history known of him was that he was seen on the lakes and afterwards in California; but he should be prepared to show that the prisoner never went to California until after the murder of Constable. The jury would observe that whenever Townsend was seen, McHenry was unknown—the two never appeared together—there never were two Richmonds in the field. The prisoner's counsel had gone all the way to California to prove an alibi; but the Crown had given them an opportunity of proving an alibi at home, and which they might have done had they shown where Townsend was when the prisoner was in Sandusky gaol. Townsend was the coolest and most daring man known. Mark his unsurpassing coolness on the night of the murder, and afterwards when he was seen at Woodstock, and then turn to the prisoner at the bar, and see with what amazing coolness he had sat there reading the newspapers containing the accounts of his own trial. He never met but one man who could act with such coolness—he did not conceive there could be two such men, and his coolness afforded a very strong presumption that the prisoner and Townsend were one and the same. After going over other evidence, Mr. Macdonald came to that of Mr. Iles, whom he declared from the imputations cast upon him by Mr. Freeman, and said Mr. Iles's testimony had been corroborated in every important particular. With regard to the system of offering rewards, instead of being blamed for the course the government had taken in this respect, they were entitled to great credit. He then drew attention to the pistol, which, he said, bore the initials "C. T." This was an extraordinary thing, but he did not attach much importance to it, because he thought those letters were put on the pistol by the maker at the time the pistol was manufactured. It was singular, indeed, that the prisoner should have been detected with a revolver and three knives in his possession, when he had only thirteen cents in his pocket to protect. The presumption was that he had not armed himself to protect property which he possessed, but with an intent to take the property of others. Among other important features in this case was that of the prisoner calling Iles by name, and his considering him a friend. If this evidence could be believed to be true, it strongly went to show that the prisoner had previously known Mr. Iles, and that he considered him to be an old friend, and not the friend of a day, as had been suggested by the learned counsel on the other side. As to the diversity in the evidence respecting the colour of the hair and eyes, he attributed but little weight to it, it being so easy for persons to be deceived with regard to the hair and eyes. With respect to the feet, he knew many instances of people who, having contracted enlarged joints by wearing tight boots, had got rid of their deformity by wearing large soft boots. The witnesses had, many of them, differed on small points; but the very fact of their so differing showed that the evidence had not been concocted and made up. He now came to the evidence of George May and his father. George-May recognized Townsend at Chicago, but Townsend said he was no longer known by his proper name, but by a name which George May afterwards told his father, and which his father said was McHenry. This was very important when taken in connection with what Mr. Harvey told Nancy Crumb—that there was no longer a man named Townsend, but that he was now McHenry. He had no doubt the prisoner had been in California, and that he had written to Captain Turnbull; but he believed Capt. Turnbull had received a letter earlier than he had stated, or that it had been ante-dated. It was easy to be mistaken with regard to the forehead, and he regretted that before he (Mr. Macdonald) came up to Merrittville the prison's hair had been cut short, so that he could not be made to wear his hair as Townsend wore his. It was easy for him to pluck out his eyebrows, and there was no doubt the eyebrows of Townsend were more bushy at the time he committed the murder than were the eyebrows of the prisoner now; and the gaoler from Sandusky said the prisoner's eyebrows were not so bushy even now as they were when the prisoner was under his custody. All the witnesses on the part of the prosecution had found that Townsend was stoop shouldered; so was the prisoner, and the only difference between them was that the prisoner threw back his head more than Townsend; but what would a man not learn to do for the sake of saving dear life; in height the prisoner corresponded with Townsend, and though the prisoner was not strikingly like the Townsend family, still there was, as Mr. Hellems remarked, a resemblance between them. There was no room to doubt that the prisoner corrected Higgins about the sale of the boat; and it was a providential thing that a criminal could not always be on his guard, but that he occasionally suffered a word to escape to show who he really was. Speaking of the scars, he said it was impossible that in the wide world another man could be found having precisely the same scars, and if the evidence of the scars was positive and could be relied upon, the California evidence, that the prisoner was not Townsend, was worthless, and went for nothing. Latest from Utah.

ST. LOUIS, April 5.

The Utah mail which left Camp Scott, March 1, had arrived. The troops continued in good health and were awaiting the determination of their commander to proceed to Salt Lake. Colonel Johnson had a regular effective force of 1,800 men, and 1,000 animals in good condition, with a large volunteer force; and the general impression was, that he would not wait for reinforcements before making the attack.—Communication with Salt Lake City was entirely prohibited, and little or nothing was known of the intentions or preparations of the Mormons to resist the advance of the troops. Colonel Johnson's despatches will be forwarded immediately to Washington.

The grass on the plains is advanced as far as it was in May last year.

Several hundred recruits from New York arrived at Fort Leavenworth, previous to the 28th March, and preparations for the early forwarding of reinforcements to the army were active.

Col. Hoffman's command of four companies had been met 400 miles west of Fort Leavenworth. Col. Johnson's supplies would last no longer than the 1st of May, but there were at Fort Laramie 4 months' supplies for 3,000 men, and it was intended to send on a train from that point to Camp Scott as early as possible. Col. Johnson now proposes to enter Salt Lake City at some point north of Echo Canon.

Death of Dr. Church, M. P. P.

We deeply regret to announce the death of Dr. Church, M. P. P., which took place in this city yesterday from an attack of apoplexy. He resided at Mrs. Brown's Boarding House, King street, where he took dinner as usual early in the afternoon. Immediately afterwards, he went up stairs to write to his wife, and about an hour after, Mr. Playfair, M. P. P. who lives in the house, knocked at his door. Receiving no answer, he entered the room and found the unfortunate gentleman leaning forward against the table; on approaching, he was discovered to be quite dead, with his face a good deal discolored. He was considerably advanced in life, and of full habit, though very temperate. His son-in-law in Brockville was telegraphed for. A son of about 14 years of age was the only relative he had near him. He was member for Leeds, which county he also represented in last Parliament. He was much beloved, we understand, in his own neighborhood, and was liked by his associates in the House. Globe.

The Examiner.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, 1858.

The Town Council.

The Council met on Monday, when the following resolutions were carried:

Moved by Mr. Burnham, seconded by Mr. Hogan, and Resolved,

That By-Law No.—— entitled, "A By-Law to authorize the issue of Debentures by the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, for the purpose of paying the balance of the subscription of the stock subscribed in behalf of the said Municipality in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company," be now read a first time.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Burnham, seconded by Mr. W. Hall, and Resolved,—That By-Law No.——, entitled "A By-Law to authorize the issue of Debentures by the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, for the purpose of paying the balance of the subscription of the stock subscribed in behalf of the said Municipality in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company," be now read a second time, and that the Council do now go into Committee of the Whole for that purpose.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Burnham, seconded by Mr. W. Hall, and Resolved,—That a general Meeting of the qualified Municipal Electors of the Town of Peterborough, shall be held on Saturday, the first day of May, A. D. 1858, at the Town Hall, in the said town of Peterborough, for the purpose of considering By-Law No.——, entitled, "A By-Law to authorize the issue of Debentures by the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, for the purpose of paying the balance of the subscription of the stock subscribed in behalf of the said Municipality, in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company," for the purpose of approving or disapproving of the same.

Moved by Mr David Carlisle and seconded by Mr. W. Hall,—That the Mayor be authorized to grant the use of the Town Hall to the Joint Committee of the Sons of Temperance and Good Templars for the purpose of giving a course of Lectures on Thursday evenings, pledging themselves not to interfere with the Lectures in connection with the Union School.

Moved by C. Bradfield and seconded by D. Hopkins—That the Collector be requested to furnish this Council, at the next Meeting, a return of all parties Rated on the Collector's Roll, that have not paid their tax, and the amount he has paid to the Treasurer for 1857.

The Council met again on Wednesday, when the two following resolutions were carried:

Moved by Mr. Burnham, seconded by Mr. Jas Hall,—That, whereas considerable time must elapse before the By-Law advertised by this Council, for providing for the balance of the subscription of Stock in the Millbrook branch can mature, and that Debentures can issue and be negociated under the same. And whereas it will be expedient and advisable in the meantime, to endeavor to raise a certain amount of funds, to go on with the work, in order to ensure the opening of the road in the beginning of the month of May.

Be it therefore resolved, that the Mayor be authorized, and he is hereby authorized accordingly, to make, sign and affix the Corporation Seal to a Promissory Note payable to order at three months after date at the Bank of Upper Canada, or such other Bank where the same can be obtained, for the sum of £2,000—and as security to such persons as shall endorse the said Note, this Council pledges itself to keep and bear harmless of all consequences the said endorsers, and that the accommodation so given shall be held and considered as a first lien on the Debentures to be issued under the By-law aforesaid, and it is ordered that the proceeds derivable from the sale or negociation of the said Debentures, shall by the Mayor be first applied to the liquidation and discharge of the money raised and of the liability to be incurred under this resolution; and it is further ordered, that the funds to be raised under this resolution shall be applied and expended by the Mayor and Railroad Committee on the Contract for the Millbrook Branch, so as to ensure the speedy opening of the same at an early day.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Burnham, seconded by Mr. Hopkins, and resolved

That the Mayor do repay the sum borrowed by this Council out of the Municipal Loan Fund debentures lately received by this Municipality on account of the By-Law for that purpose, and that such repayment shall be made to the subcontractors and workmen upon the Railway, upon the order of the Contractors to that effect, and that he be hereby authorized to borrow such parties thereof as may be necessary to insure the speedy payment of the same.

At the first meeting, Mr. John Chester Smith, of Port Hope, was present, and preferred the assistance of his Board in arranging the manner of liquidating the debt due by the town of Peterborough on the Railway Stock. Mr. Smith expressed the opinion that the Company possessed rolling stock sufficient for working the whole line, supposing the portion between Millbrook and Peterboro to be open, besides a considerable quantity now in progress of manufacture to their order.

At the meeting yesterday, the following letter from the Receiver General's Department was read:

RECEIVER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Toronto, March 31, 1858.

SIR—I have the honour to inform you that under the 4 consolidated Municipal Loan Fund Acts of Upper Canada, the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough is bound to pay into the hands of the Receiver General the sum of $1750 03, being 6 months and 38 days interest ending 30th June, 1858, at 4 per cent per annum on $100,000, loaned under provisions of said Acts to said Municipality. I have therefore to request that you will be pleased to deposit the said amount to the credit of this Department, in the Agency of the Bank of Upper Canada, if there is one in your locality, and if not, in any other Chartered Bank, and transmit deposit certificate of same to this Department

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient Servant,
C. E. ANDERSON, D. R. G.

To the Treasurer, Municipality of the Town of Peterboro.

Also the amount under, transferred from Township of Woldred's account to your Municipality:

Interest account on arrears, and contingent expenses to 31 Dec., 1856.. £61 18 8
Contingent expenses to December 31, 1857.. 10 16 0

Say $302 93

Among the advertisements will be found the new By-Law, under which it is proposed to raise the sum of £9,322 13s 9d, and, to procure this money, the Mayor is to be authorized to issue debentures to the extent of £12,500, if so large a sum is found necessary for the purpose. The Municipal Loan Fund debentures, amounting to £25,000, with which the town is charged, produced only £20,677 6s 3d., and our stock subscription being £30,000, it is evident that we have yet to obtain the balance of £9,322 13s 9d. Of course it will appear very strange that so large a sacrifice has been suffered in the converting the government securities into cash, and before the vote is taken upon the new By-Law, it must be insisted on that the trustees of the people, not the bogus railway committee, whose only apparent member is Mr. William Cluxton, Chairman, but the councillors legally appointed, give an explanation to the best of their ability of what has been done with the £1,322 13s 9d., difference between securities deposited, and the cash received. By our subscription of stock to the extent of £30,000, it is evident that the town has engaged to procure that sum and can be held liable for it, therefore, however much the parties concerned, and they are all those who pay taxes to the corporation, feel aggrieved at the expensive financial arrangement which has caused so great an expenditure of capital without a result, they will nevertheless perceive that only such portion of the funds as has been received by the contractors, can be traced in the account against them, and if the ratepayers make bad choice of their trustees, they can only reflect upon themselves and make good their deficiencies. In regard to the work done on the contract, there is every evidence that when the road is finished as it will be in May, there will be but one opinion concerning it, and that one most complimentary. In the matter of converting debentures into cash which is entirely among ourselves, there is reason to expect that the principal parties engaged in the operation have not done their business in such a manner as to enable them to justify themselves before the people. However, before the By-Law can pass, there will be a meeting called at the instance of the dissatisfied ratepayers, and the suspected parties will be called publicly to account, and even where there is no appearance of broken faith it will be expected that some plausible reason will be given for the great difference between the sum we have become liable for to the government, and the available means it has supplied us with.

The Townsend Trial.

This remarkable case has after nine days' continuance before the Court, during the whole of which time the jury was kept in confinement, been at last determined in favor of the prisoner. At a distance from the scene of trial, one cannot of course judge as closely of the question of guilt or innocence, as it was there presented, but one does, nevertheless, form an opinion in accordance with the opportunities, let them be ever so limited; and in Mr. Townsend's case there seems to be a prevailing feeling quite contrary to that which is expressed in the verdict delivered. But of course every body will be willing to accept that verdict in accordance with the conscientious judgment of the jury. It is the most extraordinary case that has come before our Court, and will long be remembered for the singular contradictions it involves.

The Histrionic Club.

A delightful entertainment was given by this classic institution on Monday evening, in the Town Hall. The scenery was well got up, and the stage management very good. Among the dramatis personæ are some of rare attainment. One of the actors who at one time represented a burly Yorkshireman, and in the next scene became a perfect model of an elegant Irishman, was particularly appreciated. Dr. Flail was very well sustained by his representative. Mr. Tidwell, the retired stock-broker, was a remarkably natural character; the miserable, mean peculiar cut of the old fellow was to the life on the stage, and no doubt the sympathy was complete. There is one or two things in connection with the entertainments, which the managers will in future do well to correct. The programme should not say "by kind permission of Captain Scott, the Rifle Band will be in attendance;" such a reference is snobbish; nor should it conclude with "Vive l'Empereur," it is unbecoming.

No Judge Yet!

The announcement, by the Review, of the appointment of Mr. Boucher to the vacant Judgeship, is premature, if not altogether without foundation. That pressure is being brought to bear on Mr. Macdonald, to make the appointment in Mr. Boucher is very certain, but that Mr. Macdonald should give way when he should be firm, is not so probable. Whether Mr. Boucher is to receive the appointment or not, we do not hesitate to say that it will not be a fit one of itself, nor will it be conciliatory to the people of these Counties. Mr. Macdonald is not the man to overlook these circumstances, and will shortly prove himself superior to the difficulties which are being thrown in the way of his making a choice, which he knows will be acceptable to the Judicial District immediately concerned.

Parliament recommenced the Session yesterday, and will occupy itself immediately with the Double Majority question, Representation by Population, and the Seat of Government.

An American Shipmaster in Trouble.

At the Marlborough Police Court, London, on the 14th instant, Louis Beavan de Croan, a captain in the American merchant service, described as of Morris street, New York, was charged with presenting a loaded six charge revolver at Cladia Celestine, lieutenant of the Infante Don Luiz war steamer, now lying at Blackwall.

The complainant said he was sitting in the Cafe Chantant in Leicester square, last evening, when the defendant, who was a perfect stranger, came up to him, and after insulting his uniform and his country, concluded by pulling his beard and moustaches. He pushed the defendant away, whereupon the defendant pulled out a revolver and held it to his face. Defendant, though sober, appeared to have been drinking.

The defendant, in reply to the charge, said he thought he felt somebody's hand in his pocket, and he pulled out his pistol to defend himself. He was an American citizen, although born a Frenchman.

The Chief Clerk, Mr. Leadly, asked the defendant if he had any explanation to offer why he went about in this country with a six-barrelled loaded pistol.

The defendant made no reply.

Inspector Coombs, C division, proved that the revolver was loaded with four balls and a proportionate quantity of powder. Five of the barrels were charged, and one had recently been discharged.

The complainant said he seized the pistol when it was presented at him and threw it on the floor, when one of the barrels went off, owing to the fall.

Mr. Bingham told the defendant that Lynch law would not do in this country, whatever might be its authority in the country of which he called himself a citizen.

To questions the defendant replied that he had not had a ship for four months, and the last vessel he was skipper of was the Texas, trading between the Florida Coast, New York and London.

Mr. Bingham.—I have now heard the whole case, and in my opinion a more unprovoked assault upon an unoffending stranger in this country I have never before had to deal with. I should be very sorry to believe that there is any community, either on this side of the Atlantic or the other, where it is necessary to go about armed to a place of entertainment with such a weapon as you (the defendant) exhibited. Such conduct cannot be tolerated in this country. As soon as you arrive in this safe and free land you must be taught to lay aside such barbarous habits, and not to intimidate people by such unlawful weapons as you have used. You will also learn to know that the police are sufficient for all purposes of protection, and are all we want here. You are a very dangerous man, and I will commit you to the Quarter Sessions for trial next Monday, where a higher tribunal will convince you that you cannot act in the way you have done with impunity.

Another Illinois Prisoner Defying his Keepers.

From the Mt. Sterling (Ill.) Gazette.

The town was thrown into consternation on Tuesday, by the report that Thomas Downey, who was in jail, charged with burglary, was literally killing himself by inches. Immediately a crowd collected at the jail, and soon had evidence that the report was well founded. They found Downey without his coat, his arms and legs bare, engaged in hacking these limbs with a razor, and, as a matter of course, the blood was flowing profusely from the wounds. He expressed his determination to end his life in that slow and torturing manner, and declared that he would kill any person who undertook to prevent him from carrying out his determination. Besides his razor, he had in his possession an iron stove-leg, fourteen inches in length. With this formidable weapon he stood ready to knock any man's brains out who should enter his cell, and being an active and determined person, would no doubt have made a vigorous attempt to carry out his threat.—During the whole day he conversed with his acquaintances, whom he could see from his cell window and the openings in the door. He said he took this method of destroying his life in order that his death might be lastingly impressed upon his associates, and that his melancholy end might prove a warning sufficient to keep them from the vice by which he had been ruined; for their good he offered himself as a loving sacrifice." At sundown he should cut his throat, and then set fire to his cell, hoping to be consumed to ashes in the flames. This, with sundry threats against individuals, and the confession of the crime with which he is charged, which he declared he had committed while drunk, was the burden of his remarks. The cutting was accompanied with singing of hymns.

But the "sacrifice" was not destined to be as complete as he contemplated. Various methods were suggested for securing him, but none of them were effectual. Finally while near the window, a quantity of cayenne pepper was thrown into his eyes, and thus blinded and thrown off his guard, he was secured.

On being taken to the doctor's room his wounds were examined and found to be severe, but not dangerous. His left arm was gashed in many places, but his legs were but slightly cut. His limbs are now extremely stiff and sore, and he is weak from loss of blood; but he is in no danger from his wounds.

P. S.—Since writing the above, we learn that Downie is quite penitent, and has concluded not to kill himself.

A Runneller's Dream.

WELL wife this is too horrible! I cannot continue this business any longer.

Why dear, what's the matter now?

Oh, such a dream! Oh I cannot endure it! Oh, if ever I sell rum again!

My dear, you are frightened.

Yes, indeed, I am; another such a night will I not pass for w 11ls.

My dear perhaps——

Oh, don't talk to me! I am determined to have nothing more to do with rum, any how. Do you think, Tom Wilson came to me with his throat cut from ear to ear, and such a horrid gash, and it was so hard for him to speak, and so much blood, and, said he, see here, Joe, the result of your rumselling. My blood chilled at the sight, and just then the house seemed to be turned bottom up, the earth opened, and a little imp took me by the hand, saying follow me. As I went, grim devils held out to me cups of liquid fire, saying, drink this. I dared not refuse. Every draught set me in a rage. Serpents hissed on each side, and from above reached down there heads and whispered runneller! runneller! On, and on, the imp led me through a narrow pass.—All at once he paused and said, are you dry? Yes, I replied. Then he struck a trap door with his foot, and down, we went and legions of fiery serpents rushed after us, whispering, runneller! runneller!—At length we stopped again, and the imp asked me as before, are you dry? Yes I replied. He then touched a spring—a door flew open. What a sight! there were thousands, aye, millions of old rum-drinkers, crying most piteously, rum, rum, give me more rum! When they saw me, they stopped a moment to see who I was—then the imp cried out, so as to make them all shake again, runneller! and hurling me in, shut the door. For a moment they fixed their ferocious eyes upon me and then uttered a yell, which filled me with such terror, I awoke. There wife, dream or no dream, I will never sell another drop.

WITHOUT GOD.—Wicked men do not consider God in the affairs of the world. They calculate every other influence which may affect their schemes, but leave out the great influence—God.

A father went to steal some corn, and took his little son with him. After filling his sack, he looked carefully in every direction to see if there was any person who might detect him. Seeing none, he was about to shoulder the sack, when the boy said, "Father you have not looked up." The father dropped his sack, emptied it, and returned home a wiser, and it is to be hoped, a better man. The idea that God was an eye-witness was not new, yet he had practically ignored the fact. He feared detection from every source, save that from which it was sure to come.

Is there not something of this folly and infantum in the course of all the impenitent? They know they must "give an account," and yet they are not preparing for it. They know that their only hope is God; yet they are living "without hope and without God in the world." They eat they sleep, they plan, they work, without practically recognizing God at all. And while they are thus living and planning, God may call them away.

It was precisely thus with the rich man, in the parable. I will pull down my barns and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and goods. And I will say to my soul, "Soul thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry." He emphatically "reckoned without his host." He forgot that GOD had something to do in the matter. But God did not forget him: "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee."—American Messenger.

NEW DODGE OF HIGHWAYMEN.—Within a recent period highwaymen and ruffians have adopted a new and rather novel way in commencing their assaults upon persons whose business may call them abroad late at night. The ruffian pulls off one of his boots, the soles and heels of which are full of nails, and standing alongside a stoop or fence, or leaning on the shoulder of an accomplice, awaits the approach of his victim. The unsuspecting citizen approaching, and perhaps gives a passing glance at the man, who pretends to have injured his foot. He has hardly passed, however, before the ruffian springs forward and with both a severe blow over the head with the boot, knocking him senseless upon the pavement. The robbery is then committed, and the unfortunate man left upon the walk. Should a policeman chance to come along before a robbery has been committed, the ruffian pretends to be lame from a sprained ankle, and limps along the walk on his stocking foot. This dodge has become much in vogue of late among the "roughs," and citizens and policemen should keep a close eye upon the bootless men in the streets at night.—New York Tribune.

Commercial.

Commercial Matters.

(From the Toronto Globe, April 1.)

Everything in Breadstuffs early spring. Notwithstanding so far as Lake Ontario is concerned, is open, and it cannot be long before water will be let into the canals, and the straits at the Upper Lakes clear of ice, Flour—the best—continues to command in several parts of the country, and should the mild weather continue, spring work on the farm will be performed fully a month earlier than last season. This will give breathing time between the completion of spring seeding and haying, and will enable farmers to bring into market the remainder of last year's wheat crops. The early advent of Spring cannot but be of advantage to the country generally, and as such we are sure it is appreciated.

The Spring Trade, generally active at this season of the year, opens under very unfavourable prospects. Notwithstanding the light stocks in the hands of country merchants, and the necessities of consumers, the severe check which credit has received, the scarcity of ready money, and above all, the immense amount of indebtedness already in the country, the collection of which by either mild or coercive means seems almost impossible, will limit the transactions in merchandize this Spring to narrow bounds. The spring openings are now nearly over, and although the greater the decrease in this respect the better will the country be off, and the sooner it will begin to revive. It is a prevailing impression with many that Spring will bring with it a better state of affairs, that the arrival of goods, the renewing of stocks, and the activity of the season, will prove equal to the task of setting matters actually to rights in trade. This year however will prove an exception, and we fail to see in what particular the trade of the country will be increased. Is it on account of the crops on the farm, and the shipment of the accumulation of flour and grain on the north shore, which are mainly to assist the wants of the former, and support its debts of the latter? Is it because any prospects of improvement. The banks seem more willing to discount, yet their circulation is limited by the small amount of business, and excepting in the purchase of wheat there is no means by which their notes can be kept out beyond ten of twenty days. The want of confidence has been a great barrier to liberal discounts, the banks hardly knowing whom to trust—and what other way is there a prospect of improvement? So far as our own immediate resources are concerned, there seems to be no prospect of a better state of affairs until after the next harvest. It is said, however, that money will be brought out here from England during the present Spring for improvement, no doubt on mortgages at ruinous rates of interest, which will afford temporary relief, but which, after all, only adds to the burdens of the country, and makes it more frequently liable to seasons of depression and embarrassment, like that through which we are now passing. Could we but use the money that annually has been sent to the mother country in the shape of interest and profits of the purchase of land for the past few years alone, a great change might be effected in the commercial affairs of the Province. As it is, however, there is no alternative at present but to go on borrowing, and it will be a matter of congratulation if one or two hundred thousand pounds can be in hand here from the large accumulation of capital in Great Britain and the United States.

This plethora of money at all the great commercial centres, and the longer and forcible that unwesonably pervades all branches of trade, seems at first sight to be a very anomalous state of things. It is difficult to account for it, but a remodelation will soon affect the financial crisis of last fall, and the same difficulty exists in reconciling the superabundance of capital with the difficulty of obtaining the same long credits on ordinary commercial security as formerly. The best explanation and argument in reference to this matter we have seen from the New Orleans Bee of last week:—"As a general rule, the old maxim that a bountiful supply of any commodity renders it cheap, is entirely applicable to the precious metals, but exceptional cases sometimes occur, and the present time offers a signal exemplification of them. The revulsion of last October has passed away, but the consequences still remain. The process of liquidation occasioned by that event is yet going on. One half of the community are paying their debts, and the other half are receiving them. As money accumulates it is placed in the bank because capitalists have not yet fully recovered from the distrust created by the financial difficulties of last fall, and will not invest their means, unless returns are sure and profits reasonable. Hence the banks are overflowing with coin, though the circulation of these institutions is far below the average point. The severe lessons of the past are too recent to be forgotten, and those who are well supplied with ready money prefer for the most part to let it lie idle rather than incur the smallest risk in the investment. Disasters, like that which occurred a few months ago, leave their traces long after the cessation of their immediate and palpable results. It cannot be expected that because the banks everywhere have resumed cash payments and are strengthened almost to the point of impregnability by acquisitions of gold and silver, confidence is suddenly to revive and spring up once more in full and undiminished proportions. The laws of political economy are vigorous.—Credit destroyed can be regulated only by slow gradations. It remains long sickly and languid, and cannot be forced into luxuriant growth.—We are even now witnesses of its progressive return. Trade is improving and resuming somewhat of its formal character, but prices, with some especial exceptions, are still depressed to a point which shows how closely pressed have been the ramifications of the credit system. Probably another season will be needed to extricate us completely from financial embarrassment and place us where we stood prior to the late momentary crisis."

At the opening of navigation much attention is directed to the probable range that prices of wheat and flour will take. Both in Canada and the United States the stock of wheat on hand is heavy: indeed it is said that at the opening of no previous season has there been so much in either countries in store and in the hands of farmers. Still, the presumption is that the supply will not be much more than adequate to the demand. On this point there is but little difference of opinion, and generally speaking, all arguments in favour either of an advance or decline in prices are based on the probability of the next harvest being a short one, in the one case, and in the other case, on its being a full one. One dollar per bushel as an average price for this market will remunerate the farmer and we think it probable that this will be about the current spring rate. In England the breadstuffs market continue depressed and prices are no better.—The average price for wheat over the United Kingdom for the week ending March 13th (the latest date) was 45s per quarter, gainst 55s 5d for the same week last year. The English crop for 1857 was excellent and 45s is said to be a remarkably low average for the quality of the wheat. There is nothing in the tone of the English circulars to indicate higher rates, indeed the opposite is the case, and if prices continue as at present our farmers will have no cause for complaint. As a class their position, at present, is much better, of their profits more certain, and their products less liable to loss, than that of any other class. All men should be thankful this year if they hold their own and make a living, leaving the accumulation of riches entirely out of the question.

The mild and dry weather of the past week has much improved the roads. The principal approaches to the city are in fair order, and country roads can be got over with moderate loads. Supplies of produce have consequently slightly increased, and since Monday the deliveries of nearly all seasonable farm products have been large. Should the weather continue dry there is a prospect of good supplies until the spring work on the farm calls for undivided attention. Farmers generally seem very much disposed to sell, and as a general thing more off the market freely at the current rates.

WHEAT.—The demand for wheat has continued unabated, with a very wholesome competition between the buyers. Up to Saturday, the receipts were light, and indeed for the whole week they only amount to 10,000 bushels from the cars and teams; yet since Monday there has been more coming in, and there is a corresponding activity in the market. The best samples have sold freely at $1 to $1 05 (5s to 5s 3d) per bushel, and one or two prime lots at $1 07½ (5s 4½d.), but those were the exceptional deals. For good to the best 90c to $1 (4s 6d to 5s) and for inferior to medium 80c to 90c (4s to 4s 6d) have been the current rates for fall or winter wheat. The sample has been as different as the range of prices is wide, yet the wheat bought at the outside figures has on the whole been much superior to what was expected from the first samples of the crop.

The purchases continue to be for milling purposes in the Scarboro' and Markham districts, for which only the best wheat is wanted. We hope farmers will press to the market as much as possible, as the opening of navigation will allow Western wheat, of which there is an abundance and of excellent quality, to come into competition with Canadian wheat, and supply the mills, by which the latter is almost taken and for prices may be had. There is at present a good demand for any quantity of wheat, and the more that is brought in during the next two weeks the better prices will be obtained. The higher the price the more will the country be benefited, as it will not be exported at this point per rapids, but will be taken elsewhere, and a good market left for our grain.

The following will show the movement in wheat at this point during the week:—

Spring Wheat is in very active request, especially for samples for seed, for which a high rate is paid. The range of prices during the week has extended from 80c to 92c (4s to 4s 8d)—the latter figure being only paid in one instance.—The current price for fair lots is 90c (4s 6d) per bushel.

FLOUR.—The flour market has been buoyant throughout the week, with an active enquiry, prices are trieted, however, to the lower grades. The offerings are small, and the amount now on the market is insignificant. The purchases have been made on Montreal, Lower States and New York account. Prices close at slightly better than at the close of last week. Superfine No. 1 we call at $4 95 to $4 in store. Extra $4 10 to $4 25 per bbl., and Extra at $4 37½ to $4 75—Double Extra 4 dols. 5c to 5 dollars. All the three latter grades for sales have not been large.

The following are the receipts, shipments, and amount in store on the various wharves on Tuesday last, April 1st:—

OATS are still and come in slowly. At finds sale at 40c to 42c (2s to 2s 3d) per bushel.

OATS are rather more plentiful, and prices are less firm, at 35c to 36c (1s 6d to 1s 9d) per bushel. During the week, sales were made at 37½d dels, but the quotation could not now be sustained.

PEAS are in good request—the better varieties for seed are wanted. Prices extends from 50c to 52c (2s 1d to 2s 2d) for Golden Vine and Marrowfats per bushel.

POTATOES are not plentiful, and are still firm at 60c to 65c (2s to 2s 3d) per bushel—inferior bring 55c (2s 9d). There is a good enquiry for seed potatoes of choice variety.

BARLEY—There is still but little doing in seeds. Timothy is bought at 52½d to 55d per bushel (1 to 1s 6d. Clover is quoted at 4d dollars to 5 dollars per bushel of 60 lbs.

APPLES have come in very freely within the past few days, and prices are lower—say 10s to 12s 6d per barrel, and one to a dollar per bushel.

BUTTER—Fine fresh butter sells very freely at 22c to 23c (1s 1d to 1s 2d) per lb. The demand may be supplied at this point per rapids, but will be taken elsewhere, and a good market left for our grain.

CHEESE is dull. The best American is held at $8 to $11 per 100 lbs. Farmers' cheese finds slow retail sales at 5d to 6d per lb.

POULTRY is scarce. Chickens are worth 70c to 75c (3s 6d to 3s 9) per pair. Turkeys $1 50 to $2 each.

PORK.—The mild weather is unfavorable to the pork trade, and the transactions for the week are light. Prices are however unchanged, and are still named at $5 to $5 50 per 100 lbs. No change in cured meats, and very little doing.

BEEF.—But very little doing in slaughtered—quoted at $4 to $5 for all parts, per 100 lbs. Cattle are in better demand at $5 to $ 50, and some at 6 per 100 lbs, sinking one-third.

SHEEP is in good request at $6 each. Calves 5 to 7 each.

WOOL.—9d per lb. Sheep-skins, 3s 3d to 4s 6d each for fair slaughtered. Beef-hides, 4 dollars per 100 lbs. Calf-skins, 6d per lb.

Grocery Trade.

WEEKLY REPORT OF THE TORONTO MARKET.

TORONTO, Friday, April 3.

We have no improvement to notice in the grocery trade beyond a slightly improved demand for sugar. New goods are arriving very sparingly, and stocks throughout are light.

SUGARS are firmer, and all through we have not advance our quotations prices have an upward tendency. We name bright Porto Rico at $8 75 to $9 per 100 lbs; Cuba bright, $8 50 to $8 75; dark of both kinds 25 cents under. In New York the market is heavy, and a pressure to sell has lowered prices 1/8 of a cent.

TEAS.—No change is noted herein the market. In New York the public sales are well attended, and lots move off at very full rates, especially for the lower grades. The market is very firm.

COFFEE is quiet. Here it is quoted at 21c to 22c for Java; 15c to 15½c for Rio; and 17c to 18c for Laguayra.

FRUIT.—But little doing. Quotations are however, fully maintained. In New York layers raisins are named at $3 37½ per box. Old Zante currants sold at 7½c to 9½c per lb.

The New York ashes market is steady, with a fair demand, especially for Pots, which are quoted at $6 25 to $6 31½. Pearls are nominal, at $6 25.

Prices in Chicago are as follows—There is some enquiry for superfine flour, but buyers will not touch extra brand at present figures; only one sale of extra was made to-day at $3 50. The wheat market is still quiet. There is considerable enquiry at 61c to 61½c, but holders do not show a willingness to operate. Not more than 5,000 bushels changed hands to-day at 61c to 61½c, and for two cartloads 62c was received for new receipts. In corn, there is nothing doing. Oats are quiet at 25c to 25½c in store, and 27c to 29c in bags. The stocks in store are named as follows:—Flour, 64,921 barrels; spring wheat, 1,536,644 bushels; corn, 20,-000 bushels; oats, 103,000 bush.

Hamilton Markets.

Saturday, April 3.

There is now a good demand for Flour, but very little in the market. Extra common $4 50 to $4 75. Sales continued to small lots. Farmers and Millers' in bags, $2 25 to $2 37½

Wheat may be quoted at about 87c to 90c nominally, there being scarcely any offering.

For Barley there is no demand.

Oats are in abundant supply at from 27c to 30c, according to the quantity sold.

Pease dull of sale at 50c.

To-day farmers came in with well-loaded waggons, and the market place presented a most animated appearance. The supply was in excess of the demand, and at noon there was much to be disposed of.

Of Fresh Meat, there was various kinds in abundance.

Pork sold at $6 to $6 25.

Beef, by the quarter, at $4 75 to $6.

Mutton and Veal 9c to 8½c per lb.

Dairy Produce maintained the prices of former days. Fresh Butter selling at from 20c to 25c, and keg at 15c to 18c.

A few Milch Cows were offered at $38 to $40, but were not sold.

It is not often that Eggs can be had in such super-abundance at Easter, and still less at such prices as ruled 80-dozy, 12 pence dozen being the top figure, and plenty were sold at 10c.

New York Markets.

NEW YORK, April 3.

FLOUR market active, and tending upward; sales, 12,000 bauels at $4 35 to $4 35 for superfine State; $4 45 to $4 50 for extra State; $4 25 to $4 35 for superfine Western; and $4 45 to $5 for common to medium extra Western. Canadian flour steady; sales 300 barrels of extra at $4 50 to $5 50. Rye flour $3 to $3 75.

GRAIN.—Wheat market quite firm; small parcels red Dutchess county at $1 20. Rye steady at 67c to 70c. Barley firm at 65c to 74c.—Corn quarter firmer; sales 24,000 bushels at 67½c to 70c; white and yellow, 69c to 71c. Oats steady.

PROVISIONS.—Pork firmer; sales 300 barrels; 16 25 to 16 50 for mess; 14 00 to 15 50 for prime.

PATENT

ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so indennibly near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either indry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Tops Roofing, Paving Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work —and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

PLASTER. PLASTER.

VIENNA PLASTER!

THE undersigned begs leave to inform the Farmers of Canada, and all concerned in the use of Land Plaster, that he is now prepared to supply all who may favor him with their patronage with the above named article.

The following analysis of this Plaster prepared by the most eminent chemist in the city of New York is proof of the superior qualities of this Plaster over any other in the State of New York:

"This certifies that I have analysed a specimen of Vienna Plaster, and also a specimen of Cayuga or Onondaga Plaster, and find them to yield respectively as follows:—

A new Road to the Pacific Ocean, through Canada—A Rival to New York coming into view—A great Exploring Expedition—Effort of England to monopolize the trade of America—Should not France do something to get a share of the great trade?—Etc., Etc.

The astonishing enlargement and increase of the trade and commerce of the Western States and Provinces of North America—a development which has taken place only within the last few years—has for some time past excited much attention, and awakened a lively interest both in England and America.

The great expedition which is about to start from London in a short time, having for its object the exploration of the regions of the far West which belong to England has been evidently fitted out with no other view but that of determining the course and direction to be given to the immense trade of Western America, which by the commercial enterprise of both countries has within the last few years assumed such gigantic dimensions. It is indeed pretended that the object of this great expedition is merely of a scientific character. It is ostensibly put forth to the world that it is a mission entrusted with the business of exploring the several countries which are still under the government of the Hudson's Bay Company. It is known that the regions under the sway of this Company comprise immense territories, which are altogether unknown at the present day, and which are, the greater part of them, still in the same wild and savage state as when they were first created by the power of the Creator of the world; they are countries where the feet of man have never yet trodden, where the echo of the sound of the human voice has never yet been heard. The expedition of which we here speak is commanded by Colonel Elliott of the Royal Engineers; it consists of a company of sixty engineers, and will be accompanied by a troop of forty men under the command of Captain Haig, of the Royal Engineers. On arriving at Vancouver it will be reinforced by a hundred men, as pioneers, selected from the most experienced and hardy servants of the Hudson's Bay Company, and will then push on and go ahead, as the mercy of Providence may please to favor it.

But we who live in the world, and who are not altogether blind to the progress and proceedings of such kind of things as these, are not to be deceived, not to be made dupes of as to the real purpose of such an undertaking. England and the United States are both of them fully sensible that the time has arrived when the sceptre of the commercial world must be grasped and held by the hand of that power which shall be able to maintain the most certain and most rapid communication between Europe and Asia. It is not merely by the Isthmus of Suez, or by the Red Sea, that henceforth the trade with the East is going to be carried on. The eastern continent of Asia will be waked up to a new commercial activity from other ports, and especially from the several ports of the Chinese Empire. Consequently, the empire of the world, in a commercial point of view, will henceforth belong to that one of the two powers of England and America which shall be the first to find means to establish a direct road across the continent of America whereby to communicate most rapidly with the great East on the Pacific side, and with Europe on the Atlantic side! This will be the great highway by which the products of the Old World will have to be carried to the Eastern world. Such a road is wanted in order to transport with abundance and celerity both the multitude of emigrants and the abundance of the products demanded by civilization.

Hence it is that the victory which is to give the empire of the world will be gained by that Power which shall be the first to establish the first line of railroad across regions and countries which as yet are unknown and unexplored. The struggle for the attainment is well worth the trouble and expense which it will cost; for the empire of the seas and the commercial domain over the whole world are the great stakes which are being played for. There can be no doubt but that the English expedition to which we have referred has no other object in view but that of preparing for the construction of a great transit road, to pass directly through the English possessions in America, by which road the Asiatic and European worlds will be, as it were, united together.

The expedition, it is said, will land at Chagres; from thence it will cross the Isthmus of Panama; it will then penetrate into California, and then, passing through unknown and unheard of defiles, over terrible and craggy mountains, it will pierce into territories yet unexplored, which lie on the borders of the Pacific Ocean, and then proceed through vast deserts and virgin forests to some port of Canada on the Pacific. Four years have been fixed upon as the calculation of the time which will be required to accomplish the purposes of the expedition. No dangers which they may encounter can affright or appal these bold and adventurous travellers. A regular boat communication will be established by means of Canadian trappers and travellers. These are a race of men who sprung from French ancestors; they still speak our language and retain the traditions of our country. By means of them, as a running post, established at different and suitable stations, news from the expedition will be regularly given to the English government, as it progresses on its march. The British government will then, no doubt, immediately set to work according to the information communicated by the expedition, and begin the railroad at the several points pointed out by the engineers of the expedition. In this way it is that we shall soon be witnesses of one of those grand and peaceful revolutions which, in all ages of the world, have played a greater part in favour of the laws of the human race than all the great and most decisive battles that have ever been fought, or all the completest conquests that have ever been made.

For several years past, with that energy and promptitude which is so peculiarly characteristic of the Canadian people—a feeble trait of character, which no doubt is to be attributed to the French blood which flows in their veins—the Canadian government has been engaged in making every possible effort in aid of the gigantic development of the commerce of the Western country.—The sacrifices which this enlightened government has made in order to draw all the Western trade to its own rivers and seas, and to lead it to concentrate at some port on its own coast, have been enormous, involving an immense expenditure of money. Its labours in pursuance, also, of the immutable laws of trade and commerce, cannot fail eventually of being crowned with complete and certain success. Let us never forget that Canada, without any assistance whatever from the mother country, and wholly and entirely out of her own local resources, has contributed in the course of a comparatively brief period of time as much as three millions sterling for the construction of a railroad of so much magnitude and importance, that Europe itself can afford no parallel to it. This railroad will be four thousand miles long, and in the course of its passage will be carried across great rivers, compared with which even the Danube itself would only be looked upon as a little rivulet of shallow water.

This vast railroad is called the Grand Trunk. As soon as it is completed to a terminus called Sarnia, it will at that place intercept and take up, for the benefit of Canada, a trade which even in 1855 exceeded in value sixty-two millions sterling. This trade, which is to be intercepted by the Canadian people, was formerly carried on by way of Buffalo, with, however, a maritime loss annually of more than a million of dollars, without reckoning the stoppages and serious delays caused by the frequent transportations of cargo which were necessary. Even already the opening of a single section of the Grand Trunk line of railroad, which took place this year, has intercepted and diverted into the Canadian channel all the local trade of the old line on that section. It has already done this to such an extent that it has caused several steamers to be withdrawn from the line, and the companies which owned them to give up all competition. The Ontario and St. Lawrence line of steamers, which had nine boats engaged in the trade, have given up and declared themselves insolvent, and their boats are to be sold to pay their debts. The employment of great ocean steamers between Liverpool and Quebec, for the carrying of emigrants and merchandize to America, with return cargoes of grain and flour to Europe, is now in contemplation and will shortly be carried into effect by the use for this purpose of the various great steamers which are at present engaged in carrying troops to India. There are many able and experienced merchants who predict that in a very short time Sarnia will take the place of Buffalo, and Montreal that of New York, blotting out, commercially, both these places from the high position they now occupy as trading cities.

The American journals themselves begin to exhibit some alarm as to the turn which things are taking, and one of them especially has pointed out very clearly the advantages of the situation and the great interests which are at stake. If we take experience as the guide of our judgement in this matter, we may affirm that the commercial products of the West, after having passed through Lake St. Clair, on arriving at Buffalo on the eastern shore of Lake Erie, must be transported to New York by the Erie canal. Consequently, in order to intercept all this trade, and to direct it into another channel, the diversion of this commercial stream must be made at some point west of the city of Buffalo. Now, Sarnia is precisely the spot which nature has prepared for this purpose. The navigation of Lake St. Clair and Lake Erie is more difficult and dangerous than that of the whole line of the River St. Lawrence.

In a report made to the Congress of the United States by a committee of the House on this subject, it is shown that there are three great and imminent dangers to which this route is exposed. These are, shipwreck, collision, and the danger of running upon shoals and breakers. These dangers on this special line arise from the narrow space to which the navigation of vessels of all kinds is restricted, as well also as from the storms to which the lakes are subject, the exposed condition of their shores, and the total absence of harbors in which vessels might be able to take refuge from any impending hurricane.

The losses from all the various causes which have occurred on Lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, Michigan and St. Clair within the period of eight years, viz., from 1848 to 1855, amounted to the sum of $5,828,346, being $1,482,086 per annum. Lakes Ontario and Michigan are four times larger than Lake St. Clan, and three times larger than Lake Erie. The low depth of water in this last mentioned lake renders the storms which so frequently occur upon it much more dangerous, operating as a sort of drawback to the extent of its area. Consequently, it is affirmed that of the amount of the losses arising to the shipping from marine disasters which we have just given, the sum of $1,132,086 out of the whole amount is to be laid to the account of this lake. The amount of loss to shipping on this lake, from various causes, in the single year of 1855, together with the damage sustained in consequence of the difficulty experienced by vessels carrying freight in crossing the flats of St. Clair, amounted to the sum of $630,445. The losses suffered on Lake Erie alone for the same year amounted to the sum of $237,241. Now, it must be borne in mind that these losses increase every year in the same proportion as the trade increases and as a greater amount of tonnage is employed in the navigation of this lake. Let us, however, suppose the annual loss for amount only to the sum of $1,000,000 every year, in this great sea have a loss of two millions of dollars.

So great and so destructive to commerce have the losses and delays experienced on the line from Detroit by Lake St. Clair always been, that at a meeting of the shipowners and others interested in the trade, held last year at Chatham the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

"Whereas, this meeting is of opinion that a trade amounting in value to the sum of $62,784,982 passed over the flats of St. Clair in the year 1855, and whereas the loss upon this amount in the same exceeded the sum of a million of dollars, therefore—

"Resolved, that the said flats are and always will be a formidable hindrance to trade, and will always prevent its being carried on to the extent to which it otherwise would be; and it is the opinion of this meeting that the difference of opinion existing among scientific men in the United States in reference to this subject, affords sufficient evidence of the fact that it is impossible to give any greater development to trade and commerce, by this route."

As a consequence of the great increase of the difficulties on this route, the intelligent and most considerable merchants of Chicago and Milwaukie have had recourse to the other route, viz:—that of the Canada Grand Trunk. This route had often been suggested before, but until the present time the enormous expense required for its construction had prevented it being brought into operation.

With such wonderful rapidity has the population of the far West increased, that that of the town of Chicago alone is at the present day twenty-two times greater than it was in 1841. Also Milwaukie, a town which has sprung up since Chicago, has within the space of twelve years increased its population twenty fold. Toronto has also trippled its population within a few years. Hence it is reasonable to suppose that all this great mass of commercial skill and talent which exhibits so much power and energy will not be long before it asks itself the question whether it would not be desirable and possible to find a safer, a quicker, and a more direct route than the slow and dangerous route of the lakes by which to disgorge and pour upon the Atlantic coast the vast amount of rich products accumulated, and, as it were, imprisoned in the far West. In 1855 the value of merchandize exported from Chicago and imported by the lakes amounted to the sum of $233,000,000. The amount in value, in the same year, of the exportation and importations from and into Milwaukie, by the same route, was $85,000,000. The tonnage employed by Chicago on this navigation amounts to 54,179 tons, and that of Milwaukie to 45,961. The exportation of the article of wheat alone from Chicago, in 1856, amounted to 20,0 0,000 of bushels; from Milwaukie the amount exported in the same year was 30,000,000 bushels. To all this immense commercial activity and movement of commodities which depends upon the route of the lakes for an outlet, we ought to add the trade from the neighborhood of Lake Superior from the various mines in that region, and from the coasting trade in general which is carried on upon the lake, for which it is impossible to form an estimate from the want of regular and sufficient data. At all events the single value of the copper and iron drawn from these regions is estimated at $3,700,000.

Here, then, we have before our eyes the spectacle of an immmense trade and commerce, which goes on every year increasing and increasing. It is a subject well worthy the most serious consideration, inasmuch as it is this very commerce which has built up the city of Buffalo, and transferred the riches of the West to New York city. Could not also our French shipowners and merchants find in this great field of the Far West a new opening for the introduction of French industrial products? Why not? The memory of the French still lingers in all these regions. These are countries which were originally settled by the French. Our language is still spoken out there. Old French customs and manners still prevail in the cities founded by our progenitors. Surely the various articles of luxury and of elegance—those superfluities which in proportion as riches and well-being increase, become so necessary to mankind—surely all those little memorials and traditions of the old country, which are held so tenaciously by those who live in far distant countries—surely all those tender and invisible bonds which bind the hearts of exiles to the land where their ancestors once lived—surely those brave sons of France, whose names are echoed in the wild woods, on the lofty mountains, upon the vast lakes, and in the crowded cities of that New World where their memory is, as it were, eternalized—surely all these would be received with enthusiasm by the people of Canada—not indeed, as new things brought from a great distance, to satisfy the new wants of a new civilization, but rather as a restored recollection of ancient reminiscences which are still cherished among them and talked over with a feeling of pride at the family fireside, when men take pleasure in calling to mind the ancient glories of their ancestors, who, coming from ancient France, brought with them to that distant shore those sentiments of chivalry and that politeness of manners which still preserve their empire among them.

Disastrous Fire and Fatal Accident.

A very destructive fire broke out yesterday morning about two o'clock, in the block of frame buildings on Adelaide street, opposite the Court House. It is supposed that the fire originated in a small brick building occupied as a bake-house by Mr. John Hayes, Tavern keeper, who besides on Adelaide street; and that it was caused by the oven being left in a heated state on the previous evening. Owing to the fire alarm being given in a very tardy manner, the other buildings in the block were nearly enveloped in flames before many persons arrived at the place. The Fire Brigade were early in attendance, and by their timely efforts succeeded in confining the fire to the block in which it originated, which consisted of four large and several small buildings, notwithstanding that considerable difficulty was experienced in procuring a sufficient supply of water. The buildings on the front street were occupied respectively by John Hayes, Tavern keeper; William Brown, Tavern keeper; T. H. O'Neill, Tavern keeper; and G. George, Tailor. The work of destruction was so rapid, that the families of Hayes and Brown had barely time to escape with their lives, and could only save what little they could pick up in their hurried flight; but through the active exertions of the assembled citizens, a large quantity of furniture was saved from the dwellings occupied by Messrs. O'Neill and George. The Police under the direction of the Deputy Chief, lent valuable assistance in preserving good order, and by helping to save and protect the property.

We regret to state, that when the fire was nearly extinguished, three of the firemen named Frederick Leppar, Joseph Beatty, and William Thompson, all branchmen belonging to No. 6, Fire Company, while directing the hose-pipes upon the flames, were seriously injured by the falling of a chimney. The first named Frederick Lepper, sustained injuries to such an extent, that his skull was fractured, and although Drs. Bethune and Potter, paid him every attention, he expired at 6 o'clock in the morning. The others a short time after having his wounds dressed, were able to proceed home. The deceased who was a moulder by trade, has left a widow and seven children, almost totally unprovided for.

It is said that the buildings were not insured and the loss is estimated to amount in the aggregate to about £1,000. The loss in furniture destroyed by the fire, and by the hasty removal will fall heavily upon the occupants of the various dwellings.—Toronto Globe.

The Reign of Terror.

In the United States Senate on Monday last, a bill was passed which empowers the President to nominate 100 men to serve as a police force in Washington. The debate occupied four hours, and the scanty report of it which appears in the New York papers indicates a most terrible state of disorder and lawlessness in the capital. We find some of the most eminent men in the Senate using the strongest terms they could employ to describe the necessity of something being done to protect persons and property. Mr. Seward declared that a reign of terror prevailed. Mr. Iverson suggested that the city ought to be made a station for 300 or 400 troops. Mr. Douglas hinted that if something were not done, a Vigilance Committee, with Lynch law, would have to be established; and Mr. Wilson declared the prevailing state of things was the legitimate fruit of the course taken by Judge Crawford two years ago, when a member of Congress, who murdered a waiter in a hotel, was allowed to escape with impunity. For the support of the force $75,000 was voted, and $10,000 as secret service money, all of which is to be paid by the government, independent of the city.

Important from Washington.

Every friend of freedom both in the United States and Canada, will heartily rejoice in the adoption by the House of Representatives of an amendment to the Kansas Bill, proposing to admit Kansas into the Union and referring the Lecompton Constitution to a vote of the people, and in the case of rejection by them providing that a Convention be called to form a Constitution. The amendment was carried, in opposition to the Administration by 120 yeas against 112 nays. The announcement was received with much applause from the gentlemen's gallery, and much confusion ensued on a motion of Mr. Keitts that the gallery be cleared. Mr. Speaker said this should be done if the indecorum were repeated. The Bill was then passed with the amendment with the same majority as before.

The matter is, however, by no means settled, for the Bill thus amended by the House of Representatives has been rejected in the Senate, and will be returned to the Lower House. There is therefore every appearance of a dead lock in the Legislature on this vitally important question, and in what way it will terminate it is difficult to conjecture.

Alleged Perjury.

At the Welland Assizes, on Tuesday, an indictment was preferred and a true bill found against the man Dornon, who, it was alleged, on the previous day committed perjury whilst being examined for the prosecution in the Townsend-McHenry case. Dornon was questioned as to his knowledge of Townsend being kicked on the brow by a horse near Thorold, about twelve years ago, when he declared himself quite ignorant of the affair, and said that he (Dornon) met with such an accident, about the time stated and under similar circumstances. Dornon was brought in on the same afternoon by Mr. Tupper.—Globe.

Railroads.

It is a happy conjunction of the circumstances and influence that attend the march of progress and civilization, that railroads and locomotion by steam should have been invented, and hence have rapidly become an element of unexampled power, just at the time that our Republic is rising to the eminence of one of the greatest nations on the earth. According to the Railroad Record, "the United States has increased in wealth full a thousand millions of dollars by railroads!" We do not for a moment doubt the truth of this statement, and will add that the augmented productions of national resources will be more than doubly augmented in the same period, for the time to come. Let it be remembered that the Union is annually gaining and settling new States and Territories. These will require railroads to bring the ever cumulative treasures of agriculture to the great cities and ports of the East, whence they will be shipped to the chief nations of Europe. We are rejoiced to perceive also that in several of the States railroads have of late years paid fair and even good dividends. Thus in Massachusetts and Connecticut, five to six per cent.—in New York eight per cent.—in Ohio (so far as returns have been received) nine per cent.—while the main arteries of Philadelphia and New Jersey have also yielded reasonable profits. Look at the rapid multiplication of the iron highways. In 1844 there were but 4,311 miles in the entire country.—but now there are 24,195 miles—with about 3,000 miles in addition that are yet unfinished. So that in thirteen years, twenty thousand miles have been built! Success, therefore, to the construction of railroads! For they promise not only to unite us by iron links, as one family, but also to promote agriculture, commerce, manufactures, population, and the rapid circulation—combined with an extensive and general diffusion of that vital principle of all industry and enterprise—money.—Baltimore American.

The Townsend Case.

M'HENRY RE-ARRAIGNED FOR THE MURDER OF NELLES.

McHenry has been sent to Cayuga, again to be arraigned for the murder of Mr. Nelles, the jury not having agreed on the former trial. It is not known as yet whether the Government will go on with the prosecution. The Assizes at Cayuga commence on the 20th. The Hamilton Times complains, with great reason, that the Government refused to send a commission to California to take evidence, as the prisoner requested, and that they did not make their decision on the subject till the 10th March, too late for the prisoner to attempt anything of the kind himself. He was, therefore, compelled to rely upon the chance of a Californian turning up who knew him, and was more fortunate therein than he had any right to expect. Considering the peculiar circumstances of the case, it would have been well had the Government adopted the suggestion of the prisoner's counsel, and sent a commission to California. The question of identity might have been settled decisively, and much injury to the prisoner, as well as the great expense of the trial, have been saved.—Globe.

SEDUCTION.—$2000 DAMAGES—Garrison vs Huffman.—Plaintiff is a wealthy farmer residing in Camden, and his daughter, Catherine Garrison, twenty years of age, was seduced by defendant, son of Jacob Huffman, Esq., also a wealthy farmer in same township. He seduced her under a promise of marriage, and afterwards denied the seduction and paternity of his child. The jury shortly came into Court, with a verdict of two thousand dollars damages—the largest ever obtained from a Kingston jury in an action of seduction.—Kingston Whig.

INCENDIARISM.—Our law-abiding village was last week startled by a rather alarming incident. A cry of fire being raised on Thursday evening, it was found to proceed from the shoe-making establishment occupied by Mr. T. H. Keough, in which a barrel filled with the combustible material was discovered to be on fire. The prompt efforts of those on the spot soon averted the danger. It would seem that grave suspicions filled the minds of those interested and the next day the Coroner was summoned to investigate the cause and origin of the fire, a sufficiently strong opinion being entertained that it was the work of an incendiary. The result, was, that the occupier of the shop was committed to gaol on the charge of arson.—Newmarket New Era.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY IN DUBLIN.—St. Patrick's Day was celebrated in Dublin with much spirit. The out-door reception of Eglington, at the ceremony of trooping the guard at the Castle, was very favourable. His excellency appeared in the balcony, with a large bunch of shamrocks on his breast, the band playing the National Anthem, "St. Patrick's Day," "The Sprig of Shillelagh," "The harp that once through Tara's Hall," and many other Irish melodies. In the evening there was a drawing room at the Castle. Saunders says it was the most numerously attended for many years, the company numbering over, 1,900 of the nobility and the gentry.

EMIGRATION OF 1857.—The official returns of emigration from the United Kingdom during the past year have just been completed. It appears that in 1857 the total number of persons who left the mother country was 212,875, of these 86,238 were Irish; 78,560 English; 16,235 Scotch; 12,624 Foreigners; and 19,200 not distinguished. The port of embarkation were as follows: Liverpool, 155,647; London, 21,766; Plymouth, 118,860; Southampton, 7,684; minor English ports, 2,414. From Scotch ports, 7,755, and from Irish ports, 5,749. The destinations of the emigrants were to the United States, 126,905; Australia and New Zealand, 61,348 British North America, 21,001; Cape of Good Hope, Natal, and other places not enumerated, 3,721. These returns show an increase of 36,068 over the year 1856.

A BAD BUSINESS.—From the account given by Lord Brougham in a speech upon the subject in the House of Lords, the French experiment of purchasing emigrants on the coast of Africa would not seem to have produced as yet any very promising results. He states that Messrs. Regis of Marseilles, the parties employed in this business of picking up negroes on the Coast of Africa, are well known as old slave-traders. Among other vessels which they employed for this purpose was the Stella, of 230 tons burden. Upon this small vessel after sailing up and down the African Coast and competing with the Spanish and Portuguese slave-traders, 260 Africans were finally embarked, purchased at $60 a head.—The voyage to Guadaloupe lasted thirty days, and in that period 240 of these unhappy negroes died. When the survivors reached Guadaloupe, it appeared that [illegible] a commission of Inquiry [illegible] more of them were re-embarked, to be carried to a different part of the island, and the vessel sinking on a rock, 80 or 90 of the negroes who were shut up in the hold were drowned.

A NEW PROPERTY OF CHLOROFORM.—The Abeille Medicale reports a case of a young man of twenty-two, who had both his legs scalded by accidentally slipping into a cauldron of boiling water. He was immediately laid upon a bed, and to prevent syncope an exciting potion was administered, and cod-liver oil applied to his legs; he was also bled twice, but the pain in his legs did not subside. A liament of laudanum and cod-liver oil was then applied, but without effect, the pain continuing as intense as ever. But chloroform being substituted for laudanum, immediate relief ensued, and was maintained by continuing the same process until recovery.

THE MAN WHO KNOWS HIS PLACE.—A rare, a mythical character! It is often advertised, often believed in, but has never yet crossed my path. "Biggam is an excellent man—he thoroughly knows his place." I straightway seek Biggam's acquaintance; for a man who knows his place must be one of eagle eye, rapid intuition, and rare modesty. He cannot know his own place without knowing that of every one else; and as this is the most difficult of all social problems, I am naturally eager to see the man who can solve it. On investigation, Biggam turns out by no means an eagle. I find him a man of servile, timid, cringing, disposition, acknowledging with great alacrity, the superiority of those who are more wealthy, or of more consequence than himself. He is either a flatterer or a "mush of concession." He does not know his place; he only knows that it is pleasant for others to have their assumption of superiority recognised, their opinions uncontradicted, their efforts unopposed. One of the most conceited men I ever knew—that is to say, the man having the most exorbitant and unwarranted estimate of his own capacity—was one of those conceding, unopposing gentlemen said to "know their place." He knew his place, that is, he was always attempting to that for which he was utterly unfit, and always failing, but verbally acquiescing in his failure, and saying, "I have not your talent, or success would have followed."

JOURNALISTS RUN MAD.—At the commencement of the Russian war it was a current idea of our journals to hint that Louis Napoleon had only gone into the Russian war for the purpose of ensnaring Britain, and that he would suddenly turn round and invade England while her troops were in Turkey or the Crimea. This idea was not much more extravagant than the one put forward by the Herald for the edification of its free and enlightened readers:—

"A descent upon England with a hundred thousand men, driven forward by the aid of steam; the capture of London, and overthrow of the government; a desperate deadly struggle for some weeks; at last a decision on the part of the English mechanics and labourers to leave the aristocracy to fight it out, and to emigrate to this country with their skill and their machinery; the acknowledgment of Napoleon as sovereign of England, and re-establishment of the Empire of the West, after 1,500 years non-existence; these may seem wild dreams, but there are some in France, who are not considered dreamers, who are turning them over in their minds."

A WOMAN'S REVENGE.—"Once upon a time," she went on, settling her muslins, and shaking her golden hair, "an officer in the guards was travelling by the night express train to Southampton. In the same first class carriage there was a lady, very young and very handsome, and I am afraid that before they reached Winchester (there was no other persons in the carriage) she permitted this bold young guardsman to imprint one kiss—he gave and she allowed no more—upon her gloved hand. It was a freak, a caprice, a bit of fun—just like the kiss which the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire gave a sweep, when Mr. Fox was being elected for Westminster. But she made him take a solemn oath that he would never reveal what had taken place. It fell out that our guardsman, about six months afterwards and in the smoking room of his club in St. James Street, broke his oath, and with the boastful, lying qualities common to men, gave the story, with some addition perfectly and wantonly false. A fortnight afterwards, he had an invitation to stay a week with a distant relative of his—an old admiral, who lived in a charming villa on the banks of the river Itchen, close to Southampton. He had never seen his relative before, but some family matter had to be arranged, and he went down. He was received with the most cordial hospitality, especially by the admiral's wife, who was very young and very handsome, and who by the merest chance in the world, turned out to be the identical lady with whom he had travelled, per night express train, from London to Southampton. She gave him her hand, unglored this time, smiled upon him very sweetly, and just before dinner drew on one side, and, with a sweeter smile than ever, told him, in a discreet whisper, that if he would come round about twelve o'clock that night to a certain window at the back of the house, overlooking the river, only separated from its brink by a narrow footway, she had something very important, and perhaps pleasant, to communicate to him. He came punctually at the appointed time. The moon was shining very brightly; the window was opened; and a lady in a night dress beckoned a tall and handsome carabine (as the parrots say) to advance to her. "And she let him in through the window. By jove, what a plucky one. Shut your eyes:"—Captain Darell, you are a liar and a traitor." And till the—she put a pistol to his head, right in the centre of his forehead, instantly his curling locks stood upon end as she mutter, and absolutely fell down dead, and Captain Darell, left to meditate upon previous, undivided thank you very much."—Household Words.

Provincial Parliament.

FRIDAY, April 9th, 1858.

INTEREST OF MONEY.

Sol. Gen. ROSE moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the law relating to the interest of money. He said there could be no doubt there was a very general, if not indeed a universal feeling, that there should be some change with regard to the Usury Laws, but what that change ought to be was a question upon which public opinion was very much divided. The whole question had undergone the serious consideration of the Government, and the bill he was now about to introduce, would, he thought, be found to meet the requirements of the community at large. A large section of the community desired that the legal rate of interest should be increased, say to 7 or 8 per cent, and that no rate beyond that should be recoverable in a court of justice. Another class desired that all existing restrictions should be done away with, and that money, like any other commodity, should be left to find its own value. There was no doubt also a not inconsiderable portion of the community who would desire the law to be left as it is. Some, as appeared from petitions presented this session, although he hoped a very insignificant portion of the inhabitants of the Province, who desire that the old penalties, done away with by the Act of the senior member for Toronto, should be re-enacted, and that the rate of interest being left as it is now, any stipulation for increased rates should be subject to penalties and forfeiture. The bill prepared by the Government adopted a middle course. They intended to leave the legal rate of interest at six per cent. But, in regard to commercial transactions, promissory notes and bills of exchange having twelve months or less to run, they intended to allow all parties to stipulate what rate of interest they pleased. They intended to abolish the Usury Laws altogether with regard to that class of transactions. They consider that this would meet the just requirements of that portion of the community to whom the temporary use of money was most valuable, namely the commercial class. The present law being the bill of the senior member for Toronto passed in 1853, left the rate of interest at six per cent, simply doing away with the penalties and forfeitures which existed under certain previous Acts which it repealed. But under it a higher rate than six per cent could not be recovered, and, at least according to decisions in Lower Canada, if a higher rate than six per cent had been paid, the excess could be deducted, when the creditor came to sue for his principal. And it was a question whether, even after the principal sum had been paid, the excess of interest paid over six per cent could not be recovered back by an action of law. In the bill he was now to introduce, he proposed to do away with that, and to allow parties to stipulate with regard to promissory notes and bills of exchange, having less than twelve months to run, for any rate of interest they pleased. In this they followed the course which had been pursued in England. There, in 1853, under the Bank Act, a provision similar to that contained in this bill was introduced, allowing any rate of interest to be charged, with regard to bills of exchange and promissory notes having three months to run. Some time afterwards, the law was extended to bills having twelve months to run. Some years afterwards, the Usury Laws were abolished with regard to all transactions exceeding £10 sterling, and not based on real estate security. Two years ago, the whole Usury Laws were swept away, and parties were allowed to stipulate for any rate of interest they pleased. The Government did not think it expedient to go so far as that in Canada, but considered it best to try the effect of this bill with regard to that class of the community who now chiefly felt the restrictions on the use of money. They first declared the present legal rate of interest to be six per cent.—a point as to which some doubt existed whether, under the bill of the member for Toronto, the repeal of certain previous Acts did not make it five per cent. They next provided that no compact for a higher rate than six per cent. should be void, except only as to the excess. Then the third clause, with reference to bills of exchange, promissory notes, and draughts at sight, provided that parties should be at liberty to stipulate for what rate of interest they saw fit. In the fourth clause, they abolished entirely, in regard to all classes of transactions, every penalty for any infraction, or supposed infraction, of the Usury Laws, and in subsequent clauses, they repealed those Acts which might interfere with the present law. The bill might not entirely meet the views of all. Some might think it did not go far enough. Others might think it went too far. But he hoped hon. members would suspend their judgment until, in the discussion on the second reading, they heard at full length the reasons which had induced the Government to bring down the bill in its present shape.

Mr. BROWN enquired whether the bill contained any provision with regard to Banks—whether banks would be at liberty to purchase Bills of Exchange at any rate?

Sol. Gen. ROSE—We make no special or exceptional provision in regard to banks. We think that, if any maximum rate were fixed in regard to banks or any one class, it would be certain to become the minimum rate.

Mr. BROWN—Then the transactions of [illegible] will come under the operation of the clause in reference to promissory notes and bills of exchange.

Sol. Gen. ROSE—They will.

The Bill was then read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Tuesday next.

ABOLITION OF THE [illegible]

PERSONS INTRUSTED WITH PROPERTY.

Mr. Atty. Gen. MACDONALD moved the first reading of a bill to prevent frauds by trustees, bankers and other persons entrusted with property. He explained that the object was to prevent moneys deposited in the hands of trustees, bankers, and others, for safe keeping, from being mixed up with their private properties, and being thus lost in case of their bankruptcy.—Carried.

THE JURY LAWS.

Hon. Mr. SMITH in moving for leave to introduce a bill to amend and consolidate the Jury Laws of Upper Canada, said that while impartiality was secured in the selection of jurors under the present laws, the practical machinery to enforce those laws caused great expense to the country. A larger number of jurors was selected than was necessary, and a class of jurymen were frequently chosen in whom the public had not that confidence which ought to be reposed in jurors. There was a selection of jurymen in the first instance, and afterwards there were no less than three ballotings.—Reeves, township clerks and assessors were appointed a Board, in the first place to appoint jurors and place them on the assessment rolls, and these rolls were returned to the clerk of the peace for jurors to be drafted for the quarter sessions. This second selection was by ballot, with a view to secure an impartial jury. The law next required that after the Sheriff had received his precept a second process of balloting for jurymen should be gone through, and that from the jurymen so balloted for, the clerk of the Court whilst sitting in court should draft by ballot twelve men to try the case in dispute. Thus there was only one selection of jurors, and three ballotings.—Now, although, as was known by many hon. members of the House, he (Mr. Smith) had, for a lengthened period, been in favor of the ballot, he could not see that the proper way to try the ballot was in the selection of jurymen, where the object to be obtained was a better class of jurors, because it was idle and absurd to say that by drawing a number of names from a ballot box, a good and efficient jury would be secured. It was partly with a desire to obtain a better class of jurors that the Government proposed by the bill now before the House to do away with two of the ballotings. The bill provided that instead of two-thirds of the persons legally qualified to serve on juries being selected in the first instance, there should only be one-third. Two objects would thus be accomplished: the party selecting would have a much better opportunity of choosing a good class of jurors, because, instead of being compelled to select two from three, he would only have to choose one from three; and in the next place, one-half of the expense was immediately wiped away. And in this age of economy and retrenchment, when all men were desirous to see measures carried into law of a character such as would tend to reduce rather than increase the public expenses, every one must be prepared to adopt the suggestion of the Government, in this case, without a moment's hesitation—if for no other reason than that of the saving of expenses.

Mr. BROWN—How will that be accomplished?

Hon. Mr. SMITH—The Clerk of the Peace was at the present time obliged to copy every name selected, and he was allowed so much per hundred for performing that duty. In the County from which he (Mr. Smith) came, the names of 2,500 jurymen were returned to the Clerk of the Peace, the County Attorney, the Warden of the county and the Sheriff—all of whom were officers of the law, and supposed to discharge their duties impartially—

Mr. FOLEY—Even though the Sheriff purchases his office? (Hear, hear.)

Hon. Mr. SMITH—The hon. gentleman would have an opportunity of speaking on that subject when the matter came before the House. These five officers would have power to make a good selection of jurymen, instead of their being indiscriminately drafted from the ballot-box, and in order that there might not be the least suspicion of partiality against the jury, the right would be given to each of the parties litigant to challenge three jurors, without assigning any reason for so doing. The clerk of the court would still have to ballot for jurors, and thus, while by the previous selections, the best possible class of jurors was secured, a guarantee would be given of an impartial jury being selected. These were, in short, the principles of the bill, and he moved it be read a first time.

Mr. HARTMAN said that by Mr. Baldwin's bill the power was very properly taken from sheriffs of selecting juries, in order that there might not even be the appearance of juries being packed.—The only power of selection was vested in the local officers in each township, and their power was so limited that only a small portion of the men so selected could be called upon to act during the year. Where power was placed in the hands of any one person, it might and would be abused. The principle he had named was that which made Mr. Baldwin's system so popular. With regard to the question of expense, it seemed that the hon. gentlemen on the other side now saw the error they committed two years ago in repealing a very good amendment to Mr. Baldwin's act for cutting off one-fourth the cost.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said the hon. gentleman did not remember the difference between the present law and the law of which he complained. The old law allowed the Sheriff to select such persons as he pleased whilst the present bill would compel him to call four other persons to his aid in making the selection, and to make the selection in open court.

Mr. FOLEY said that, after all, the economy was only a sort of cheese-paring one. The hon. gentleman claimed credit for economy, and at the same time confined that economy to only one officer, leaving the other officers in the same position as they were in before. In the hon. gentleman's own county, where there were so great a number of jurymen, the fees of the clerk of the peace, derivable from this source, probably amounted to no more than £30 per year, whilst the Sheriff of Norfolk who was said to have purchased his office, derived not less than £542 per year for summoning jurors to try the criminal cases alone—apart altogether from the civil business. As the hon. gentleman was proposing to economize, it was desirable that other parties besides clerks of the peace should be considered.

The bill was then read a first time, and the second reading put down for Tuesday next.

MUNICIPAL LAW OF UPPER CANADA.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD moved the second reading of his Bill respecting the Municipal Institutions of Upper Canada. He said the Bill had been widely circulated through the country, and many suggestions of value had been received. After the second reading, he proposed to submit the Bill to a Committee, composed of such members of the House as had most experience in municipal matters. It was the intention of the Government to embody in the measure such amendments as should be found necessary to make it a full, complete and valuable digest of the Municipal Law.

Mr. BROWN—Although he objected to the general principle of referring Government Bills to private Committees, he admitted that, in the present case, such a course might be desirable.

The bill was then read a second time.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said he should now move the reference of the Bill to a Committee of gentlemen who had had experience in Municipal matters—Hon. Sidney Smith, who had long been Warden of his own County; Mr. Benjamin, who had also been Warden of his County; Mr. Hartman, who was still Warden; Mr. Ferguson, at present the Warden of his own County; Mr. Mowat, who had taken the principal part in the original preparation of the measure; Mr. Angus Morrison, Dr. Connor, Mr. Roblin, also a Warden, Mr. McKellar, whom he understood to be thoroughly versed in these matters, Mr. Carling, who had been a City Alderman, and himself. He moved the reference of the bill to a Committee, consisting of the gentlemen he had named.—Carried.

AMENDMENT

To be proposed by Mr. Langevin on Mr. Thibaudeau's motion of the 17th March 1858, on the subject of the Double Majority.

Mr. Langevin moves in amendment to Mr. Thibaudeau's motion:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted:

This House is of opinion that the principle of the Double Majority which has been recognized and adopted in the Government and Legislature of this Province since 1848, ought to continue to be recognized and adopted to the manifest advantage of the two sections of the Province.

AMENDMENT

To be proposed by Mr. Ross to the Hon. Mr. Cauchon's proposed motion in amendment to that of Mr. Thibaudeau of the 17th March, 1858, on the subject of the Double Majority.

Mr. ROSS, in amendment to the Hon. Mr. Cauchon's proposed motion in amendment to that of Mr. Thibaudeau, will move:

That all the words after the word "that," where the same first occurs therein, be struck out, and the following substituted:

Inasmuch as no precise or definite rule has been laid down or observed in relation to the effect upon the Administration of the day, of an adverse Parliamentary vote by a majority of the representatives of the whole Province, it would be inexpedient to adopt any positive or inflexible rule as to the effect of the Government being in a minority of the members of this House elected in one section of the Province, while sustained by a majority of the whole. But that the Imperial Parliament, by enacting in the 12th Section of the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 35, commonly called the Union Act, that the parts of the Province of Canada, then constituting Upper and Lower Canada, should be represented in the Legislative Assembly by an equal number of representatives, without regard to the respective populations of these two Provinces, engrafted the federal principle upon the Union:—The the Parliament of Canada admitted and sanctioned the same principle, when, in increasing the number of representatives by the Act 16 Vic., cap. 152, after the census of 1851, it maintained a numerical equality between the two Provinces:—That the Canadian Parliament gave it a yet more decided and expressive sanction by extending it to the Legislative Council, by the provision in the Act 19 and 20 Vic., cap. 140, to the effect: that the members elected should be forty-eight in number, viz., twenty-four for Upper Canada and twenty-four for Lower Canada:—That her Majesty's Representatives, in selecting their Executive Councillors, as a rule, in equal numbers from Upper and Lower Canada, have also acquiesced in this principle of the Union, and sanctioned in the administration the federal character of the Constitutional Act of 1840:—And that by the Act 18 Vic., cap. 2, intituled "An Act to make better provision for the appropriation of the moneys arising from the Lands heretofore known as the Clergy Reserve, by rendering them available for Municipal purposes," the Parliament of this Province again maintained and sanctioned a separate and distinct division of rights and interests between the inhabitants of the two sections by appropriating, for the exclusive benefit of those of Upper Canada, a portion of the Crown domain, situate within the limits of their section, and equal in value to £300,000 and upwards, while those situate within and appropriated to Lower Canada amounted in value to the sum only of £96,000:—

That the federal character thus originally imprinted upon the union of these Provinces, and subsequently confirmed by Acts of the Provincial Parliament, and practically and continuously enforced in the composition of the Executive Council, and the separate and unequal appointment of the Public Domain, would be injuriously impaired, whenever the advisers of the Representative of the Sovereign selected from any one section, should continue to administer the Government of the Province, after they had manifestly ceased to possess the confidence of the people of such section, as expressed by their representatives in Parliament deputed from that section.

BILL.

AS PASSED BY THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

An Act to allow Verdicts on Trials by Jury in Civil Causes to be returned although the Jury may not be unanimous.

Whereas, on the trial of Civil Causes it not unfrequently happens that the Jury are unable to arrive at an unanimous decision, and by reason thereof are discharged; and whereas the unnecessary delay thereby occasioned and the heavy expenses of a new trial consequent thereon are productive of serious inconvenience as well as hardship to Suitors. Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council and Assembly of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. That from and after the passing of this Act, if upon the Trial by Jury of any Civil Cause in any of Her Majesty's Courts of Record in Upper Canada the Jury are unable to agree upon a Verdict, and if, after having been kept in deliberation for a period of six hours, nine of the said Jury shall agree, the Verdict agreed to by such nine may be returned as the Verdict of the Jury, and shall be taken and recorded, and shall have the same force and effect as if found unanimously by the whole of the said Jury, any Statute, usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding; and during the said period they may be furnished with necessary refreshment by leave of the Judge.

In and Out.

From the London Times.

The recent change of Ministers has been productive of one effect that will not be unpleasing to the public. The tongue of Mr. Bernal Osborne has been loosened, after an almost unintermitted silence of five years. The readers of the debates for some years prior to the formation of the Aberdeen Government, retain an agreeable recollection of the lively debater, the witty critic, and the humorous satirist. Mr. Osborne could enliven the dullest discussion by the flashes of his wit and the play of his fancy, and he was never reluctant to set the House in a roar. But the weight of official duties appeared to press fatally on the natural elasticity of his disposition. From the day he was made Secretary to the Admiralty there was no more of his lively sallies, and his voice was rarely heard, except explanation of the estimates. It was clear that he, at least, could not dance in fetters. There was no choice for him but to have his way, and full liberty to kick out in every direction, or to remain inactive. His superiors in the Ministry dared not trust him. Once, in the Crimean debate, he rose to defend the Government, but ended by pouring a broadside from the Admiralty into the Horse Guards. After that indiscretion care was taken to keep him down. Whether the Administration gained a good Secretary we cannot say, but the country lost an able and persevering advocate of Radical Reform. Mr. Osborne took example from the statesmen of a neighbouring country, and shelved his old principles in obedience to the ruling power. He put away his Radicalism, and bound himself to unconditional-Palmerstonianism. Again in opposition, his fetters are broken, and he is as free as the aboriginal man was, "when wild in woods the noble savage ran." He may not only assail the existing Government, and openly speak his mind of all possible candidates for, but he can even turn round on his late chief, and snub the Speaker. On Monday night he revelled in his newly-acquired liberty, and he took advantage of the situation to bring the Administration to book. He was met by Mr. Disraeli, who, if not so fiery or fanciful as his opponent, is an equal master of dialectic artifices. There is a special interest in marking the conflict. Mr. Osborne was out, and Mr. Disraeli was in. The two gentlemen had entirely changed positions. The gentleman who was out had no burden of Cabinet secrets on his back, and he was able to talk freely. Indeed, his knowledge of what lay in the pigeon-holes of the late Government enabled him to expose the plagiarisms of the present. The gentleman who was in was under all the obligations of an official position, and, although he was denied Mr. Osborne's old refuge in silence, he was bound to maintain great reticence. Mr. Disraeli, when in opposition, was a close and constant critic of the Government. In some respects he exactly matched Mr. Osborne in the same situation. He made exactly the same charges against the Palmerston Administration which Mr. Osborne makes against the Derby Administration. The whole fight between them resolves itself into a tu quoque, which the author of the "Comic Latin Grammar" translated into the vulgar phrase, "You're another."—Mr. Osborne flies at the Ministry, and charges them with having taken office without a policy or a principle. Mr. Disraeli retorts, and says that the Ministry did just the same. The House of Commons took on amusement or exhibition of rhetorical gladiatorship, and while indulging in the cheers, counter-cheers and laughter, duly recorded by the reporters, forget that there is a people out of doors impatient of the interruption to all useful legislation caused by the bandying of office between aristocratic sections.

Mr. Bernal Osborne started on a certain vantage ground. In former times parliamentary contests were conducted with a view to establish principles, and not for the meaner purpose of obtaining places. We are driven to alter our vocabulary, and to read "placemen" where formerly we read "statesmen." Nobody was more persistent than Mr. Disraeli in insisting that a ministry should have a policy and a principle. The Derby Government take office without one or the other. They are in power by an accident, and they ask for "time, forbearance and money." What title have they to make such claims? In the ordinary constitutional course, the minister who comes in is expected to reverse some cardinal point in the policy of the ministry who goes out. Englishmen do not understand a change of men without a change of measures. They expect that every ministry shall reflect the opinions of the country, and they cannot understand how any set of men should be permitted to take the direction of public affairs out of the hands of another set without announcing some distinctive policy. Were the new ministers fall-they accede to office without any measures of their own, and they not only continue the measures of their predecessors, but they ransack the depositories of the public offices for bills and plans which the late Ministry were preparing to submit to the country. The men who always proclaimed that—without party there could be no Parliamentary Government—are now trying to govern without an organized party, and they confess that they rely for their tenure of place on the want of union amongst the various sections of Liberals opposed to them. They are in an acknowledged minority, and they know that at any moment a hostile combination may compel them to a resignation or a dissolution. There seems something desperate in the resolution taken by Lord Derby. His own special organ in the press asserts that he has full powers, and that, if defeated on any important question, he will go to the country. It is impossible that he can believe in the smallest chance of obtaining a majority at a general election. He must know that his tenure of office is limited, and there would be something profligate in his disturbing the whole country without a prospect of gain. There have been reactions and revulsions of opinion amongst the English people, which have borne the Tory party to office, but there is no symptom of any such movement at the present time. The new Ministry may conciliate the forbearance of the House of Commons, but it would be absurd to say that they have the confidence of the Parliament or the country. We see them taking up measures which they opposed, alleging in excuse a deference to the will of the House of Commons. In 1855, Lord Derby put on record, in very emphatic language, that such a course would be one "such as no man of honour or character would voluntarily expose himself to." Now, urged by his hungry followers he submits to this degradation, and he enters upon office, content to hold place on sufferance. It may be that there was no intrigue or no unworthy combination to oust the Palmerston Administration. That may be granted, but we may still dispute the title of Lord Derby, Mr. Disraeli, and their friends to take the vacant places.—They have come in because Lord Clarendon made a mistake, and they are asked that they may not be disturbed because the Queen has chosen them. They go further, and declare that if they are allowed to draw their salaries, they will adopt the measures of the late Government.—They voted for the Conspiracy Bill on the first reading, and they opposed it on the second. Yet they now assert that the Walewski dispatch, which was the ground of the second vote, was not insulting to this country, and that the House of Commons were in error when they displaced the Palmerston Government. This is blowing hot and cold in a manner which the English people will not relish. The Conspiracy Bill has been abandoned for the present, but there is no security that it will not be revived if any failure should occur in the prosecutions instituted against Mr. Truelove and M. Bernard. Again, the India Bill of the late government was strenuously opposed by the leading members of the present Administration. In that opposition we were disposed to agree with them, and we are now at a loss to understand the sudden change in their opinions which induces them to take up the bill. Then we come to the question of Reform. Lord Derby is averse to change, and thinks that "the late Reform Bill has given to the country a representative system, the result of which is a House of Commons which fairly and fully represents the feelings of the members as well as the intelligence and the property of this country." He would be glad that no legislation should be called for, but he is ready to bow to the House of Commons, and to "consider" a measure. Mr. Disraeli and the leading members of the Government in the Lower House pledge themselves to nothing, and Mr. Henley and Lord John Manners openly avow their hostility to any change which would admit the people to a larger share in the Government. Sir Fitzroy Kelly announces a scheme which appears liberal on the face of it, but when closely examined it appears a plan for transferring the whole representative power to the counties.—There is no doubt that it would be unsafe to leave the cause of representative reform in such hands. So far Mr. Osborne made out his bill of indictment, and he was equally successful in showing that the new ministers do not agree amongst themselves on important public questions, such as Church Rates and the Jew Bill.

There can be no question that we have a Cabinet made up of heterogeneous materials, without a policy, and "filling up their seat from the border and the wardrobe of their defeated rivals." We have Mr. Disraeli's opinion of such a Government, spoken in 1845, and we quote it as one of the curiosities of Parliamentary change of opinion. It shows the difference between being in and out. The occasion was the convocation of Sir Robert Peel to the principle of Free Trade. Here are the words:

"The noble lord (Russell), the representative of Mr. Fox, will not galvanize the ashes of that great leader. 'Here, not memorize.' I would not [illegible] to him how [illegible] the opposition [illegible] What [illegible] the Lord George Gordon's case, and other cases, that if a person conspired against the life of a potentate in amity with our Queen, it was an offence, and that even without an overt act.

He had shown the court, of course, subject to the opinion of a jury as to the credibility of the witnesses, that the prisoner had done acts in this country which made him an accessory before the fact to the murders, which were, undoubtedly, committed in Paris. Mr. Bodkin then cited the 9th Geo 4, c 31, to show that a British subject could be indicted for murder, or as an accessory to murder, before or after the fact, though the crime was committed abroad. He maintained that the prisoner, though an alien, was a British subject in the meaning of this act, being resident in England, under the protection of our laws, and therefore subject to them. He quoted authorities to show that, in respect to murder, even ambassadors were amenable to the laws, though they would not be for treason, as they owed no allegiance to our Sovereign.

Mr. Sleigh complained of the course taken by the Government in commencing the proceedings as on a charge of conspiracy, and varying the case to one of murder, after they had got on the deposition evidence which might not have been obtained upon the latter charge.

Mr. Jardine said: My course is a very clear and a very simple one. Even if I saw any legal difficulty in the case, which I do not, it would still be my duty to submit the matter to the judges. I am not surprised at the course taken by the Crown. They were probably not aware of the full extent of the disclosures which would be made as the case proceeded step by step, and I confess that I was wholly unprepared for them myself. No one, not even Mr. Sleigh himself, could have expected the charge to remain one of misdemeanor only, after what had come to light.

The prisoner was then fully committed for trial on both the charge of Conspiracy to Murder, and the capital charge of being an Accessory before the fact to a Murder Committed on Land in a Foreign Country.

Colonisation of India.

From the London Times

Every one has his nostrum for India, which is at present termed, in newspaper phraseology, the theatre of war, and, like other theatres, wherein the company is more obedient and the machinery less complicated, every one thinks himself capable of management. There is, however, one manager, who has acquired considerable popularity, and who is expected to redeem it from its present low condition, and place it on a permanent footing of prosperity. Whether the impetuous lord now invested to control Indian affairs will realize all that is expected remains to be seen, although our absurd system of governing may, by another change of Administration, turn him out of office in the very middle of his proceedings, and not allow us to see the full revelment of his intentions.

The cry now most in vogue is, "The Colonisation of India," and enthusiastic politicians repeat this cry, thinking the thing is no sooner said than done; but those who know anything of India, and, indeed, those who know anything of geography, of human affairs generally, know that it is a subject fraught with difficulties, and demanding the calmest deliberation. One of the most acute of our contemporaries, noted for the statistical and economical turn of its daily commentaries, has some very judicious remarks on this matter:—"We have colonized North America; we have colonized the West Indies; we have colonised the southern extremities of Africa; we have colonised Australia; we have colonized New Zealand. In each and all of these countries we have found—or we have pretended that we have found—immense tracts of land, thinly inhabited by tribes scarcely yet started in the career of civilisation; tribes which had not begun to be organised into states or nations, and upon which the idea of permanent ownership in land—as it has been developed among civilized peoples—had not yet dawned. In such countries there was ample room for colonisation. There was far more land than the scanty population could occupy or turn to account. The utmost progress that the inhabitants had made towards the conception of ownership in land was the vague apportionment of certain regions, as hunting grounds, to certain tribes. When the new comers appropriated to themselves certain definitely marked out lands, and set themselves to reclaim these lands from the waste, they neither encroached upon the real interests nor upon any imaginary rights of the natives. There was room enough for both; after the colonists had been amply supplied there still remained lands enough for the aborigines. The natives were deprived of nothing in which they could lay claim to a permanent right of ownership; for even where the first rude attempts at cultivation of the soil had been begun, the ground, tilled and reaped for a year or two, was deserted as soon as its virgin fertility began to abate, and abandoned to its original condition of being the property of everybody, or nobody, which means the same thing."

In India things are in a very different state. The crowded inhabitants of that region are permanently settled cultivators of the soil, and have a great adhesiveness to their paternal fields and are greedily desirous of the possession of land. And this feeling is universal amongst all the peoples and nations which we comprise under the name of India. It is as true of the mountain ranges as of the plains; and statistics prove to us that the pressure of population on the productive powers of the soil is as great in the cultivable portions of the Himalaya as it is in the valleys of Switzerland. Almost every habitable part of Hindostan is occupied; and although we may hope that in time steam, aided by capital, may carry roads through what are now tangled masses of jungle, and that science may drain pestifero is marshes and cut down unprofitable forests, yet this can only be the result of a higher civilisation of the natives.

It has been the fashion lately to urge the Roman mode of colonization as an example, but that is a resort to an arbitrary military establishment, which neither the circumstances of the case, the genius of the times, nor the precepts of Christianity permit. To make a desert and call it peace, might do for the brutal conqueror elected by the Pretorian Guard; but it ought not, and it cannot, be carried out by Englishmen in the nineteenth century. Our mission is protection, not extermination.

Every means should be used to induce European immigration and settlement in India, and it is hoped that railways, and mountain establishments, and towns, will enable the western man to become acclimated, and to found a race that will be born, live and die, on the soil. We look forward with hopeful confidence to the increase of permanent European land owners at the Nilgherries and similar stations. We would do everything in our power to promote railways, telegraphs, and other means of rapid transit and intercommunication in India, by the investment of the surplus capital of Europe. Such operations are already in progress, and yearly expanding. But, if they are to be for permanent good, they must be left to expand naturally, not by any forcing process, under the name of "colonization." In India "colonization" means, in the first place, confiscation of large tracts of Hindoo and Mahommedan territory for the benefit of European speculators. It means, in the second place, the immediate eradication of codes of distributive law, with the provisions of which all the natives are familiar, and the compulsory substitution of an alien code, whose language and ideas are alike unintelligible to them. And, lastly, it means the conferring of superior political powers and privileges upon the European settlers, in order that they may, directly or indirectly, impose a yoke of compulsory, inadequately remunerated labour on the natives.

Any wild, or blind, and unjust attempt of this kind can never bring hundreds of millions of various races and kinds under the influence of true civilization, and we should suppose that the wildest advocate for conquest and colonization is not prepared to adopt a course before which the Hindoo, like the Red Man, may perish from the face of the earth. Justice has hitherto been the preservative of a handful of British amidst countless hordes of Indians, and we must continue to rule by that means. There is no doubt, from the latest news, that the rebellion is gathered to a head in Oude, and that the eighty or hundred thousand Sepoys driven into Lucknow by the manœuvres of Sir Colin Campbell will enable England so to vindicate and mark her superiority, that after that final and signal blow and avengement have taken place, we must return to a wise and moderate ruling of the mighty nation confided to us. Immigration, intermixture of race, a commension of language, manners, and, above all, religion, the permanent investment of capital, and the acclimatation of the European race, and its future on the Hindoo soil, are to be earnestly desired and carefully promoted; but violent colonization, or the attempt to force another race into the property of the country, is to be scrupulously avoided. We want not Pizarros nor Cortez, nor do we intend to make Hindostan a modern Algeria, or to divide the conquered territory into six thousand fiefs, and, like another Williams of Normandy, degrade the nation to the serfdom of the Saxons. We are not bandits, but Christians; and when the sword is sheathed, we look not for plunder or confiscation, but an enlightened civilisation.

FINAL EXAMINATION

COMMITTAL OF THE ACCUSED ON THE CAPITAL CHARGE OF HAVING BEEN ACCESSARY TO MURDER.

In consequence of the announcement by Mr. Jardine that the Court would sit on Saturday, the 11th inst., with closed doors, the attendance of persons seeking admission was much less than on former occasions. At three o'clock, however, the doors were thrown open as usual, and a sufficient number of spectators admitted to fill the space apportioned to the use of the public.

Mr. Jardine then said: I have ordered the doors to be opened because I am most anxious that if possible this should be an open inquiry; but I must leave it to the good feelings of the persons whom I see here not to make any exhibition of their feelings. What is proper in a debating society is very improper here. It is an insult to the prisoner and to every one concerned. If such conduct is repeated I must, however unwillingly, close the court.

The same counsel appeared on both sides. Sergeant Ridgeway produced some letters found at the prisoner's lodgings.

Mr. Joseph Taylor, engineer, of St. Martin's-place, Birmingham, was then examined. He said: The grenade produced was made by me, with five others; two of the same size, the rest an inch larger. I made the shells from a model which Allsop furnished to me. I made them in Westminster. I received this letter from Allsop.

The letter urged a speedy execution of the work without further delay. A second letter from Allsop, dated 21st November, 1857, stated that the writer would call on him in Birmingham. Two days later there was another letter on the subject of the models. A fourth letter asked for the castings by return of post. It added, "When I saw you on the 8th October, you promised me the castings in three days, and it is now three weeks." The last letter, dated 18th November, enclosed a post-office order for £2 0s 6d., which would "balance the account."

Examination resumed: I altered the size of the holes by order of Mr. Allsop. The order was completed by the 23rd November. On that day Allsop came to me at Birmingham. He complained that the nipples were not as they were described in the order. They were to go through the shell a quarter of an inch. Mine did not; and he objected to them. I did not make the nipples. As I had deviated from orders, I offered to make the nipples out. Allsop said he would take them to his friend in London, and if they answered I should be paid the full amount. He then took with him the shells and the nipples, and I was ultimately paid the full amount. Mr. Allsop was about 60 years of age. He was six feet high, rather stout, stooped a little, spoke rather quick, and was a little dull of hearing.

John Gerard Wich, Belgian Vice-Consul at the Court of London: My office is at St. Marychurch, Bury-court. On the 26th of November a foreigner made application at my office for a passport for another person. I told him that, according to the regulations, the party must come himself. An hour and a half later he came to my office and showed me the passport produced. I observed that the signature of the bearer was not attached to it. I mentioned this to him. I detained the passport. In about ten minutes he returned to my office, accompanied by another person. I should say he was fifty-five to sixty years of age, rather stroog built, about six feet high, and rather stooping. He was a healthy looking man and turning grey. When I spoke to him he did not catch my words: in fact he was slightly deaf.

Mr. Bodkin: What name did he give you?

Witness: Thomas Allsop.

Mr. Bodkin put in a letter in the handwriting of Allsop and found in the prisoner's residence. It was dated January 1, 1858, Cooper Read Kent; commenced, "My dear doctor," and contained the following passages: "I am glad to find difference of opinion limited to a single, point. Differences of opinion exist in every army, but unity of purpose is necessary for action However, I have every confidence in the future. The abominable miscreant of the 2nd of December seems to have reached his culminating point. Have you seen the withering contempt with which Smith O'Brien alludes to the Queen's kissing this unconvicted felon? He is not likely to give much more trouble even if he should escape the retribution he so richly merits. If I was in California now, I would double the amount offered by Lander to the man who should perform an act of justice towards that most wretched caitiff. It is a poor consolation to know that he is obliged to drink before going abroad. He must be killed, and with him the system he feels it necessary to keep up. * * * *

I shall feel pleased to hear of Orsini's progress. Be kind enough to assure Orsini of my warmest sympathy, and affectionate respect. * * *

Yours paternally, &c." Then followed a postscript, "I may this first year be the first instalment of justice to the peoples' dawn of life, the true friend of humanity."

Mr. Bodkin said it might be necessary to adduce other evidence at the trial which must follow this investigation; and if so, those who conducted the prosecution would pursue the ordinary course to the defendant the prisoner, of furnishing him with a copy of such additional evidence. The evidence now being complete for the present, the question arose, "What offence the prisoner should be committed for?" The offence went far beyond the crime of conspiracy. He thought it right however before the duty of sending that question out of courts, to say to his friend and in justice to the prisoner, to say what the intention was, in order that his learned friend might not come unprepared to meet him. In the first instance, the attention of the Court was directed to the common law misdemeanor of a person in this country conspiring to effect the death of a person in amity with our Queen, our own Sovereign; and in that case the law could not be disputed. It was decided by the Lord

English Subjects Abroad.

The main source of Lord Palmerston's late popularity was a general belief that, in dealing with foreign Governments, he maintained a fearless and thoroughly English attitude. In his celebrated Civis Romanus speech he announced to the world that every Englishman went abroad shielded by the ægis of his country, watched over by the vigilant eye, and protected by the strong arm of his country. Without being absolutely pugnacious, or given to quarrelling, John Bull likes to keep a bold front to the world, and to hold his own manfully. He is slow to give offence, and he will not bear an insult impatiently. At home he is accustomed to full freedom of speech and action, and when he travels in other countries he expects that his nationality will be respected. He enters every state as a friend, either to spend his money, or to trade, and his presence is always beneficial. He is annoyed beyond endurance by police agents, gendarmes, passports, and the other hindrances to intercommunication devised by the wisdom, or hatched by the suspicions, of continental Governments. Knowing that he is always liable to be impeded, he naturally wishes for a strong Foreign Department, properly represented by diplomatic agents zealous in upholding the honour of the English name. In these days there are few men who do not visit the Continent of Europe at one time or another on pleasure or business. Most of us, therefore, feel an interest more or less direct in the security of English travellers. But beyond that the whole British public are sensitive for the character, the independence, and the dignity of this great nation, and they will not suffer either to be violated in the person of even the humblest native of the Islands. While Lord Palmerston was believed to represent the national feeling in this respect, the people were willing to overlook short-comings in other directions. We will not venture to predicate whether the ex-Premier has renounced the principles which he so emphatically declared in 1849 to be at the foundation of our foreign policy. The fact is beyond dispute that the late Government displayed an undue leaning to reactionary states, and cultivated Austrian friendship, while they discouraged the independent efforts of the few minor states who give a shelter to constitutional principles. More than that, British subjects travelling abroad were never subjected to so many insults, annoyances, and impediments as during the last five years. Englishmen on the Continent were made to feel that they could not rely on the protection of their own Government. We will not recur to the timid councils which induced the late Government to leave Count Walewski's dispatch unanswered, or to the Italian questions on which Lord Clarendon truckled to Austria. We are sure that the whole country shares in the pain, astonishment, and shame felt by Mr. Gladstone at finding that the duty of vindicating the law of nations and the rights of Englishmen had been allowed, in the case of the Cagliari to fall into the hands of the Sardinian people, instead of having been taken up by England herself. To the case of the English engineers we have to add that of Mr. Hodge. This gentleman was suspected of some participation in Orsini's plot, and he was arrested at Genoa. The French Government claimed that he should be delivered up to them, under the provisions of an extradition treaty. A stipulation in the treaty bound the Sardinian Government not to surrender a foreigner without the consent of his own Government, and the fate of Mr. Hodge still enabled on the balance when the Piedmontese Administration was overthrown. It is now alleged on good authority, that the arrest of Mr. Hodge took place in consequence of information furnished by the English, and not by the French Government. More than that, it is stated that "the late ministers of England, both directly and indirectly, through the diplomatic agents of both countries, advised Count Cavour and his colleagues to deliver up Mr. Hodge to the French authorities." We can scarcely bring ourselves to believe that any English minister would sink to such a depth of baseness. But as the statement has been made public from a respectable source, it ought to be thoroughly sifted, and it is the duty of Parliament to give Lord Clarendon an opportunity of exonerating himself from a charge, which, if proved, must cover him with enduring infamy.

We rejoice to see that the new Government are proceeding in a different spirit. After they came into office a communication was received from the Sardinian Government, and Lord Malmesbury sent for copies of the papers found in the possession of Mr. Hodge. Having examined those papers, and finding that they did not afford evidence which would warrant the committal of Mr. Hodge by an English magistrate, Ministers refused their consent to the demand of the French Government. At the same time they instructed the British Minister at Turin to require the immediate release of Mr. Hodge. There is also reason to believe that, at least, some effectual interference will take place on behalf of the English engineers, now in the tenth month of their incarceration in a Neapolitan prison. There is now the highest legal authority that their arrest and imprisonment were and are contrary to the law of nations. There is no doubt that facts not known at first, which clearly establish this proposition, were in the possession of the late Government months ago, but no demand was made for the release of these British citizens, held in captivity by an arbitrary Government. The engineers were captured on the high seas in a Sardinian ship, and their arrest was clearly unlawful. Every ship carries her nationality with her, and the sea is common to all nations. The engineers, the crew, and the passengers were entitled to all the privileges and immunities which they would have had if they had been standing on Sardinian territory. The primary and fundamental defect of the whole proceeding could not be cured by the forcible transfer of the ship and all on board to the Neapolitan jurisdiction. The Government of Naples had no right to detain the men, or to put them upon their trial. Our fellow-countrymen have been seized, thrown into a noisome dungeon, and detained for ten months in an imprisonment such as the vilest criminals could not be made to undergo in this country. One man has lost his health, and the life of another is in danger. There cannot be a doubt that the Neapolitan Government desired and intended, in the persons of these men, to insult and defy the power of England. There is a heavy account to be enacted by the moody tyrant, who is the scourge of his own people. The reckoning has been too long delayed, but we trust that it is now near at hand. Mr. Disraeli has announced to the House of Commons that all the facts have again been submitted to the law officers of the Crown, and that their opinion will be laid before Parliament. We cannot doubt that their opinion will conform to common sense and the law of nations, as expounded in the elaborate examination of the case published by Dr. Phillimore. The next step must be a peremptory demand that the engineers shall be released, and compensated as far as money can compensate them for their horrible sufferings. The demand must be seconded, if necessary, by force. If Bomba prove obstinate, he must be made answerable for the consequences; and if amongst them should be the loss of his throne, it would be a great gain to humanity. At all events, the petty tyrants of Europe must be taught that British subjects, wherever they may be, will be protected by the whole power of their country.—London Times.

Economy in the Customs

"We understand that the salary of Mr. Mendell here will be $2,400—$1,000 more than that of his predecessor. He was discharged for alleged incompetency in Toronto, and this incompetency, we suppose, is a sufficient reason why his salary should be increased in Belleville. If the late Collector of this place was guilty of any mismanagement or defalcation, we can't see that Mr. Mendell is more immaculate. Why then is one so scarificed that the other may be rewarded? As far as we can ascertain, the salaries of the Customs officials for Belleville amount in all to the sum of $4,000! while the amount of duties collected will scarcely reach twice that sum! It is no wonder that our exchequer is continually low, while such extravagance in public patronage abounds. Here we have four pampered officials foisted upon us, to do the work that two could easily accomplish. Two posts are therefore perfect sinecures, and the only utility of the occupants is to keep up a corrupt Administration for so many dollars per annum.

With regard to the above the Toronto Globe says, it is be true that the salary of the new Collector at Belleville has been made £600, while his predecessor only received £300, the same should be brought before parliament. If Mr. Meudell was discharged for misconduct he should not have his salary in his new place made as large as that which he received in a port like Toronto; and if he was merely removed to make room for Mr. Spence, then it is an abominable job, which should be exposed as soon as possible. The whole Customs' system is a mass of corruption. Men are constantly appointed whose services are not required. A searching enquiry into the Customs Department would show beyond doubt that half the present expense might be saved.

In the House of Lords on the 25th, Lord Malmesbury referring to the case of the British Engineers at Naples, said that Mr. Watt had arrived in England, and Parks had been liberated on bail.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Griffith asked the Chancellor of Exchequer, if in the opinion of law officers of the Crown, the capture of the Cagliari was illegal, if it was intended to demand full and ample compensation to the Engineers for treatment they received?

Mr. Disraeli declined to answer.

The Usury Laws.

It is very encouraging to notice that the question of interest of money is again before Parliament. The tendency of public opinion is evidently towards free traffick in the article of money, as in every commodity it represents, and the legislature promises fair to grapple with the difficulties that are urged in extenuation of the Usury Laws. Nobody pretends to advance fair argument in defence of these restrictions on commerce and the growth of trade. The only reason given for continuing the system of limited interest is, that the needy debtor may compete with the prosperous trader in his dealings with the capitalist, which is the case when the rate allowed is below the price set upon it by solvent borrowers. The bill now before the House of Assembly proposes to leave the rate at six per cent, except where the security given is a promissory note or bill of exchange, not having longer than twelve months to run; in such cases the parties are left free to settle their own price, and the law will enable it to be taken. Why the distinction is made in favor of one class of securities, and not of others, it is difficult to determine, unless it be to enable the banks, which deal almost exclusively in the securities proposed to be set free, to take advantage of periods of distress which themselves may provoke. The banks have privileges apart from the rest of the community, and in view of them, it would be only equal if they were restricted otherwise, where individuals are at liberty. The right course would seem to be that the legal rate of interest should be advanced to what experience teaches us is the ordinary value of money on long time, and to make the operations of all monied institutions and all unascertained rates conform to this; but in every other respect, and without regard to the character of the securities, whether it be real as in a mortgage or imaginary as in a promissory note, the parties ought to be enabled to recover against each other the uttermost farthing stipulated for. This is the way to satisfy the lender that his capital is appreciated at its full value, and thus to attract this much needed class to our shores; and it will also enable the borrower to make his terms in accordance with the market value of money and the relative value of his offerings. Dealing in this open manner, the solvent trader would not be obliged to raise his bid for the money of the feverish usurer, against the reckless advances of the consumer, nor would the man of money need to require a larger rate than his due, to cover the risk the law imposes upon him. It is notorious that on this continent of rapid development, six per cent is never the true value of money amongst ourselves, and knowing this by unfailing experience it is impolitic to risk the removal of capital, by refusing it the interest which by common consent it is entitled to.

Trial by Jury.

A Bill, originating in the Legislative Council, is now before the House of Assembly, the provisions of which are to enable juries in civil suits in Upper Canada to find a verdict, after six hours confinement, although only nine out of the twelve are of one opinion, and the verdict so found shall be as effectual as though the jury were unanimous. In all criminal actions the old rule of unanimous findings will be continued, the accused being held entitled by the mercy of the law to all doubts. The change in favour of determining private issues by a three-fourths verdict will no doubt be found to overcome much of the injustice that is often done by one of the body sticking out against the rest, and forcing them to consent to his particular notion. The manner of making up the jury lists is also to be simplified, by consolidating the present jury laws, and enacting a new one, under which, besides procuring the jurymen from among intelligent persons, each litigant will be allowed to object to three names, as they are drawn, without giving reasons.

The Municipal Laws.

Attorney General Macdonald has brought forward his Bill respecting the Municipal institutions of Upper Canada. The difficulty of arriving at the state of the law, as it is recorded in the Statutes relating to this branch of the body politic, is so insurmountable from the very multiplication of the enactments, that the country will receive with great satisfaction, the removal of the unintelligible mass, and the establishment of a rule under which the men of plain common sense, who are required to act under it, will understand what duties the legislature imposes on them, and what powers it confers on them. There is no local question more necessary to the good government of the country at the present time than that which is contained in the arrangement of the Municipal law.

The double majority question is now fairly before the House, and the tone of the debates seems to indicate that the temper of the House is very strongly inclined to insist upon the accommodating principle of ruling each section according to its separate decision. Mr. Macdonald has the disadvantage of being pledged by a former announcement of the principle, and cannot point to any opening whereby to free himself from his engagement. The Opposition from Upper Canada members has been persistently and systematically exhibited throughout

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 15.

THE ORANGE SOCIETY OF IRELAND.

The Marquis of Londonderry:—I beg to ask whether the letter from the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland is still intended to stand as an instruction to the Lords Lieutenant of Counties, or whether her Majesty's Government are disposed to take a different view of the matter? (Hear)

The Earl of Derby: The Government are of opinion that a letter of the late Lord Chancellor Brady, laying down a principle of absolute disqualification to a certain party for magisterial appointments, was a step beyond the law. And whatever objections might be urged against the Orange Society, we regard its existence and organization as perfectly legal, and, therefore, that its members should not be subject to any disqualification. I think that nothing can be more inconsistent or inconvenient than to issue a general order by the Lord Chancellor refusing to grant the commission of the peace to any person belonging to any particular class or party. (Hear, hear.)

OUR RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.—OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

The Earl of Malmesbury: My lords, I beg leave to lay on your lordships' table the correspondence that has taken place between the Government of her Majesty and the ministers of the Emperor of the French, since her Majesty's late ministers resigned their office. (Hear, hear.) I am happy, my lords, to state that that correspondence puts an end to all those misapprehensions which had unfortunately for a short time existed between the Governments of the two countries, (hear.) And it would be unfair for me not to add that that desirable consummation has been considerably facilitated by the frank and handsome manner in which Count Walewski came forward after the Commons had expressed its opinion and disapprobation of the terms of his despatch by its vote of the 19th February.—I repeat, my lords, by the frank and handsome manner in which that Minister expressed his sentiments to Lord Cowley. Count Walewski expressed his deep regret that his statements had been misunderstood, and gave the most satisfactory explanation of the expressions which in his dispatch had given umbrage to the House of Commons. (Hear, hear.) I think, upon reading this correspondence, your lordships will agree with me that the matter has terminated in a manner honourable and creditable to the good feeling that prevails on both sides of the Channel. I have nothing more to say upon the question than that her Majesty's Government place the highest value on that alliance, which has proved of so much consequence to the happiness of England and of the thorough conviction that the same feeling is shared in by the Emperor of the French, whose sentiments, through his Minister, your lordships will find are clearly and satisfactorily expressed in those dispatches, (hear.) In order that I may not alter a word of the language used by the French Minister on this occasion, I beg leave to quote an extract from his dispatch. "We are convinced," says the Emperor of the French, "that the reconciliation of two great nations, after centuries of antagonism, would be sincere and lasting on one condition only—namely, that the honour of the one shall never be sacrificed to the honour of the other" (Cheers.)

THE DUBLIN POLICE AND THE TRINITY COLLEGE STUDENTS.

Earl Rosse alluded to the circumstances attending an affray between the police and the students of Trinity College. The newspapers of this morning contained an account of a most disgraceful attack made by the police upon the young gentlemen students of that college, inflicting serious injuries upon several of them. If the police of London had been on duty at the time, a very different course of proceedings would have been taken (hear, hear,) and he could not help thinking that a strict investigation ought to be made, not only into the conduct of the Dublin police, but that of the two individuals under whose control they were placed. (Hear, hear.) From what he saw of the conduct of the students, there was not the least occasion for this attack. He saw Colonel Browne on horseback, and he led upon him to control the police ruffians, who were inside the college rails cutting and slashing the students, but Col. Browne seemed to have lost complete command, not only over the men, but over his own temper. There were no stones thrown at the police, and, indeed, the students, being on their own ground, which was gravelled, could not get any to throw, even if they felt inclined. It is true that a few oranges were thrown, but nothing to justify so gross and frightful an outrage. The question he wished to put was whether it was the intention of the Government to order a searching investigation into the conduct of the police? (Cheers)

The Earl of Derby: I have been informed that several of the young men were severely injured, and that two of them are not yet out of danger; and the Lord Lieutenant, in a private letter, assures me that he has ordered a strict investigation to be made into the whole of the circumstances attending this deplorable event. (Hear.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 15.

THE CASE OF THE CAGLIARI AND THE ENGINEERS.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer:—With the permission of the House I beg to state the course which the Government propose to take with respect to a subject under discussion on Friday night, and with respect to which there is considerable misapprehension in the public mind. I allude to the case of the Cagliari. When we entered office we found, after the greatest deliberation, it was the unanimous opinion of the Cabinet that the jurisdiction of the King of Naples had been acknowledged by our predecessors in office, and that we were precluded from taking any steps in contravention of that decision. Under these circumstances it was our opinion that, in deference to those rules which regulate the affairs of nations, it was not open to us to impugn that jurisdiction. We had then to consider what, under these circumstances, was the best we could do to assist our countrymen in the unhappy circumstances in which they found themselves. It was our opinion that the best course was to send a person instantly of character and influence to Naples, instructing him to insist upon the immediate trial of our countrymen, and to give them, by all means and methods, the utmost assistance and aid that he could. After denying that the late Government, on their leaving office, had reconsidered the subject, he said—We have felt ourselves now perfectly free from the engagement, which we apprehended had bound the Government of the state of England, and when we have submitted a case to the present law advisers of the Crown, and obtained their opinion and duly deliberated upon it, it will be our duty to do that which we think is for the interest of law, and right, and justice. We shall act without fear of favour, whether we deem it our duty to recognize the rights of a Sovereign or to vindicate the rights of our fellow subjects. We have given directions that all the papers connected with the management of the Cagliari case by our predecessors shall be prepared and laid with all reasonable dispatch before the House. They are more voluminous than, perhaps, the House imagines. But no unnecessary delay will take place in their preparation; and it now only remains for me to say, that after the greatest deliberation, and being perfectly aware of the great inconvenience which, under general circumstances, would accrue by submitting the opinions of the law officers of the Crown to the House, it is our opinion that, under the peculiar and exceptional circumstances of this case, it will be our duty to lay the opinions of the law officers of the Crown before the House. I hope the House will understand that in our judgment there are circumstances in this case which render an exception to that rule one that should not be generally observed. The remarks of the noble lord the member for London were perfectly just as far as they went with regard to the mode by which Parliament becomes acquainted with the opinions of the law advisers of the Crown, or of so much as the ministers may deem it for the public convenience that Parliament should be made aware of. But for the cessation of diplomatic intercourse with Naples no communication of that character could be made the means of imparting this information. Under these circumstances we have thought it better to place the papers before the House. I beg to assure Parliament the utmost energy and prudence will be exercised and exhibited by her Majesty's ministers, whose utmost attention and solicitude will be devoted to this painful subject.

Lord Palmerston was glad to learn that the whole of the papers would be laid before Parliament. It was quite true that the late Government had practically acknowledged the jurisdiction of the King of Naples, for they were not aware of the place where the capture of the Cagliari took place. It turned out that it took place beyond the Neapolitan jurisdiction; but another was started, namely, as to whether the capture was made by force or whether it was a voluntary surrender. This was submitted to the law officers of the Crown, and they were of opinion that until the point was cleared up it was not so clear a case as to warrant the Government in making a demand which must be followed up by force. The late Government were, therefore, expecting some communication from Sardinia which would throw light upon the subject; for if the Cagliari should be given up to Sardinia, there would be no doubt as to the course which the Government, in that event, would be bound to adopt.

THE POLICY OF THE NEW GOVERNMENT.

On bringing up the report of the Committee of Supply,

Mr. B. Osborne rose to call the attention of the House to the possible policy which the Government would adopt. He was justified in this course by the vague statements which had been made both in Parliament and on the hustings. He passed in review those statements. The Government had come into power with all acknowledged majority. It was contended that they were not the only possible Government, but being in office, they ought to declare their policy. "Since I have been a member of this House, if there is anything more than another which I have heard the right hon gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer insist on, it is the necessity of a Government having a policy and principles. Over and over again, in my hearing, has the right hon gentleman denounce a ministry after ministry for want of those qualifications, and in magnificent language and peripatetic terms denounced the absence of a policy and principles in the character of the Whig party." After reviewing the conduct of the members of the Government when in opposition, he contrasted their recent conduct with their present professions, and then adverted to Mr. Gibson's amendment. My right honourable friend the member for Ashton had always appeared as the advocate of those principles which are supposed to be symbolized by the lamb. On this occasion he mounted the lion. (Laughter.) The opportunity was too tempting for the right hon gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli); he lost no time in getting up behind (renewed laughter); and owing to, I regret to say, the somewhat careless conduct of the noble lord, the late head of the Guver ment (laughter), the right hon. gentleman, with the aid of this ingenious amendment and c ndersable address defeated—I was going to say lockeyed—the late Prime Minister. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) I did not mean to charge the right hon. gentleman with intrigue; but this I do say, that that amendment was discreditable to his party, and will not add to the reputation of British statesmen. He then proceeded to review the conduct of the Government on the India Bill. In opposition they opposed it and now they were going to take it up. Now, what was the course taken by the present advisers of the Crown in the introduction of the India Bill by their predecessors? The hon. member for Huntingdonshire would not even permit the bill to be introduced; and in "another place," even before the introduction of the bill, a petition was presented from the East India Company by Lord Grey, the noble lord to whom the Earl of Derby applied to help him to form a Government. Lord Grey having presented that petition, the noble lord, the present President of the Board of Control, after abusing the East India Company and directors, condemned any legislation on the subject of the Indian government at present, stating that the time was ill-chosen, and that he was always opposed to extemporized constitutions. As to he Jews.—What did the Government intend to do with regard to that question, and the Bank act, and the Church-rates? Then, what did they intend to do with regard to education? What did they intend to do with reference to Ireland? No allusion has been made in "another place," or on the hustings, to what the policy of the Government on that question is. We can only judge of that policy by recent appointments; and this I do say, that those appointments are not looked upon with any particular favour by the Irish people. (Oh, oh). I believe the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland drew up the rules and regulations of the Orange Society in Ireland, and what course did the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland adopt in regard to that Society? Why, he wrote a letter to the Lord Lieutenant of the County of Down, saying that he would not appoint to the magistracy any gentlemen who were members of an Orange lodge. What course do the Government intend to pursue with reference to that Society? Again, what course do they intend to adopt with reference to the system of national education in Ireland? Two years ago the present Secretary for the Home Department moved in this House an amendment which would have had the effect of ruining that system. The present Lord Chancellor of Ireland is a decided opponent to the system, and is, I believe, a member of a Society which works a rival one. What did the Government intend to do with regard to Maynooth? He held in his hand a paper which contained the names of thirteen of the Government who opposed that grant. Then as to reform. All the members of the Government held different opinions upon that subject. The noble lord the member for North Leicestershire told his constituents that he was the advocate of "national Toryism," and then asked what was the measure of a Reform Bill. He only saw cause for dissatisfaction in the deficiency of the representation of the counties.—The right hon. baronet the member for Droitwich said he had no particular regard for the £10 freeholders, but declined to give his constituents any pledge as to what his course on the question of reform would be. The right hon gentleman the member for Buckinghamshire said that the late reform Bill was a gross Whig job; but I hope the right hon. gentlemen recollected that one of the makers of that reform Bill was the Earl of Derby, who thought that it represented the property, the intelligence, and the feeling of the country. But what was said in Suffolk on the question of reform? A plan of reform was there sketched by the honorable and learned gentleman the Attorney-General for England, the last representative of the principles of Mr. Fergus O'Connor in this house (laughter); but I cannot believe that the Government intend to carry out the Chartist principle expressed by the hon. and learned gentleman. (Laughter.) It is true that we have the speech of the noble lord the member for King's Lynn, who is, I believe, a true reformer; but he occupies a very peculiar position. I can very well understand that position, which I think we should honour (hear, hear); but I fear that this reforming Ajneas will find a difficulty in carrying out with him the Conservative Anchises. (Laughter and hear, hear.) No, sir, I much fear that he will find some Dido of a Conservative in the way of his good principles. (Laughter.)—Well, then, I think I am justified in asking what are the principles and what is the policy of the present Government? For my part I am indifferent to mere party cries (oh, and a laugh). But I hold this that men who have honestly advocated measures in opposition ought to be called upon honestly to carry them out in office. (Hear.) I am not sure whether or not that is a sentiment from which hon. gentlemen differ; but of this I am sure, that any ministry taking power by a discreditable manœuvre will not advance their own cause nor the interests of the country.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer: Sir, one of the consequences of a change of government is, that some voices are heard in sound within these walls which had for a long time previously been silent. (Cheers, and laughter.) I confess when on Friday last I listened to that shriek of liberty (great laughter) which was raised by the hon. gentleman, it was with no feelings of alarm or mortification; but he will permit me to say, after having listened to his remarks to-night, that the weapon, I think, has become a little rusty; and there I do not doubt that, with sufficient practice, it will resume the brightness which has dazzled us before, still I must remark to the hon. gentleman, by way of consolation for his present position, that it is only in opposition that he will find those opportunities (hear, hear) which I can assure him are necessary before he regains that "eminence" office for which he was once celebrated. (Cheers.) Mr. Disraeli then referred to the precedents of former Governments on taking office. They had not made an immediate exposition of their policy. Such was the course of Lord Palmerston in 1855. He then proceeded to justify the Government in taking office. He had been taunted with voting first for the Conspiracy Bill, and then for the amendment, which threw it out. With reference to that the hon. gentleman has accused me of voting for the amendment upon that bill, after having spoken and voted in favour of it. Now, I should not venture to trouble the House upon that subject if the hon. gentleman had not forced it so clearly upon its attention. But the words which I used when I voted for the introduction of the bill must be in the recollection of many hon. gentlemen in this House. I said, I vote for the introduction of this bill because it is a means by which the House can show to a faithful ally that they sympathise with him in his most difficult position; but I said with regard to the bill itself I entirely reserve to myself upon the second reading, if ever it comes to a second reading, the power of taking a free and unfettered course.—(Hear, hear.) I described it as a measure that was feeble and inadequate, and I do not believe that any gentleman in the House imagined that that bill would be supported by me upon a subsequent occasion. (Hear, hear.) As to the policy of the new Government, in the first place, I beg to say at once, that it is not my intention, nor is it at all necessary for me to make any statement with regard to the general principles and views of her Majesty's Government. (Loud cheering.) As to the composition of the Government, the hon. gentleman, who is so anxious that we should take a course which is not unprecedented nor unparliamentary, is indignant at the formation of a government in which all the members are not upon all questions exactly of the same opinion. (Cheers.) "What," says the hon. gentleman, "will you do about Church rates?" Well, then, I say to Mr. what did you do about Church rates? (Cheers and laughter.) I hope I may be permitted to refer to a division, though not to a speech, which took place in the present session—namely, on Wednesday, the 17th of February. I find that an under secretary of State, and a noble lord holding a high office in the Household, voted against the Ministerial suggestion (hear, hear), while the hon. member for Dover and most of the other members of the Government stayed away. (Cheers and laughter.) What did we find respecting the Jew Bill? We found a member of the Government in the House of Lords always voting against that bill which was carried by large majorities in the House of Commons. I can convince him then that ours is not the only cabinet which may have divisions of opinion even upon the Jew Bill. Well, and how did the hon. gentleman and his friends act upon the ballot? I want to know how the late united Government, the members of which had all of them the same opinions upon all questions, or ought to have had, found themselves on a question so interesting to all sincere and earnest reformers. I find that on the 30th of July last the ballot was before this House, and a division took place. I find that the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the President of the Board of Control, and other members of the Government were in the majority against the ballot. (Hear, hear.) I find in the minority the names of a distinguished nobleman in the house of the Attorney General, the vice president of a board, and the distinguished Secretary of the Admiralty (loud laughter)—that distinguished individual who is now alarmed at the prospect of a cabinet being in existence which is not of the same mind upon all questions which can be brought under the consideration of the House. (Great cheering.) Sir, I think, then, that the course which was taken by my noble friend in another place was a much more judicious one than that which might be pursued, according to the views of the hon. gentleman, by a minister who should make a formal programme of measures which are never carried, and elaborately develope a policy of which, to a deluded people, four years are entirely barren of fruit. (Cheers.) With regard to the Indian Bill, I never said, nor do I now say, that the course which we are taking is in deference to the majority of the House. A majority of this House is no doubt always to be respected, but is not to be obeyed with servility. If we opposed the introduction of the noble Lord's bill this year, we opposed it on the ground that it was inopportune in the present state of India—that it was unwise to weaken the influence of Government in a country where revolt was raging. The India Bill would be introduced before Easter. As to the Irish policy, it would be the same as that pursued by Lord Eglington years ago. Lord Eglington is again in the same high office; he is animated by the same feelings; he will be guided by the same instructions, and I hope we shall find from those instructions and those feelings that the same results will be obtained—that he will be the popular representative of the policy of this cabinet, and that under his influence Ireland will continue as good tempered and as prosperous as it is at present. (Loud Cheers.) the hon gentleman says, "What do you mean to do about the Orange magistrates? do you mean to make Orangemen magistrates? Well, I am not an Orangeman. (Laughter.) I am very sorry that circumstance, over which none of us could have any control, have led to the institution of societies like Orange societies and other societies of the kind (hear, hear); but no doubt they do not spring out of nothing. (Hear.) There were causes originally which produced their formation, and we must deal with established sentiments and institutions as we find them. But if the hon. gentleman wants me to pledge the Government to this policy, that because a man is an Orangeman he shall not be a magistrate, I can only say that I never will consent to anything so essentially unconstitutional. (Loud cheers.) It was not the intention of the Government to disturb the present system of national education in Ireland. But if we can combine, without in the least impugning the principle upon which the national system of education is founded—if we can combine with that a just belief that those Church schools which now receive no assistance from the state, that is a question that well deserves the consideration, not merely of a minority, but of Parliament, and which moderate men, on all sides, have considered with great respect; and, certainly, if we see any mode of adjustment which we believe will be satisfactory to all parties, we do not preclude ourselves from introducing and establishing it. The subject of the Reform Bill of 1831 was then touched upon by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Is it wise that a question of this magnitude should be allowed to remain unsettled or unsettled? Is it wise that the country should be allowed to believe that a measure of this importance may be taken up by statesmen for party purposes? (Cheers.) If there is anything more likely than another to poison the feelings of the country and to alienate their sentiments from our institutions, it is that a suspicion should be permitted to engender in the public mind that the schemes for the reconstruction of the institutions of the country are used by public men for party purposes. (Renewed cheers.) It is impossible that the question of parliamentary reform should be permitted to be taken down or hung up for the more convenience of any party that in opposition he may brandish it in the face of his opponents, and that when in office it may be allowed to slumber in the darkest corner of Forgetfulness. (Hear.) Under these circumstances we feel it is our duty to consider the question, and to consider it with the earnest endeavor to effect such a settlement of it as may satisfy the sober-minded people of this country. (Cheers.) The honorable gentleman the member for Dover asks me what are the principles on which reform bill is to be founded? I do not think that I am called upon to tell the honorable gentleman what are the principles of a bill that we do not propose to introduce to the notice of the House during the present session. The honorable gentleman asks me what our reform bill is to be—I will tell the hon. gentleman what our reform bill is to be. It will not be a bill designed to prop up a political party, or to secure the interests of a particular class. (Loud cheers.) It will be founded on principles of general justice, and I hope it will give universal satisfaction. (Laughter and cheers.)

Mr. Horsman acquitted the Government of anything like intrigue or plot in coming into power. They had while in opposition acted with much moderation and forbearance, and were, therefore, entitled to be treated with every courtesy by those whom they had displaced. He deprecated, therefore, such attacks as that of Mr. B. Osborne, and thought the Liberals should reserve themselves until some measure of practical utility, in which there might be a difference of opinion, should be brought under consideration. He attributed the fall of Lord Palmerston to his habit of seeking to conciliate his foes, rather than to confirm his friends by the liberal measures which they sought and expected at his hands. A little reflection upon this would, he thought, be of great service to him on his next advent to power, which he believed must very speedily take place.

Lord J. Russell disclaimed all idea of embarrassing the Government, though he feared many important questions would arise on which he would find himself holding a different opinion from her Majesty's Ministers, upon which he would not hesitate to act when such occasion might present itself. The noble lord vindicated the Reform Bill from the charge made against it by Mr. Disraeli as being a gigantic Whig job, and said he could have no confidence in any Reform Bill to be brought forward by the right hon. gentleman who had thus so grossly libelled the authors of that act. He felt very little security on the subject of reform, for the Earl of Derby had said that he was not certain that there were defects in the existing system, and he should look with suspicion on any such measure if Mr. Disraeli were to have much to do with it.

Mr. H. Drummond thought the Reform Bill of 1831 contemplated the overthrow of the Tories, and the prevention of their advent to power for a long time.

Lord Palmerston said there would be no factious attempts on the part of the late Government to obstruct the present Ministry. He thought the occasional support his Government received from the Conservatives was as honorable to be the Government as to the opposition, and he was always glad when the measures of the Government met with support, no matter which side of the House it came from. The noble lord then said he had come into power, not from any wish of his own, but because of the failure of combinations which had been attempted; and he was willing to leave the character of his 3 years' administration to history, satisfied that its verdict would be that he had not abused the confidence reposed in him by his Sovereign and the British Parliament.

"Should the French Emperor preserve in certain inklings, too clearly manifested in Count Walewski's last despatch, the result must be to fling England into alliance, however tacit and disowned, with the civilized democracy of Europe. It is the position of Mr. Canning some thirty years ago, a position which he did not shrink from avowing, and which he pursued chauvinist to the last. Nevertheless, who is so anxious that we should take a course which is not unprecedented nor unparliamentary, is indignant at the formation of a government in which all the members are not upon all questions exactly of the same opinion. (Cheers.) "What," says the hon. gentleman, "will you do about Church rates?" Well, then, I say to Mr. what did you do about Church rates? (Cheers and laughter.) I hope I may be permitted to refer to a division, though not to a speech, which took place in the present session—namely, on Wednesday, the 17th of February. I find that an under secretary of State, and a noble lord holding a high goods have been removed, we were told, by the parties whom their late owner left in charge. By whose authority, or for whose benefit the removal has been carried into execution, we have not heard. Pierri has left a daughter, now in a conventual school at Leicester, to whom, we apprehend, any sums arising from the sale of his effects are legally as well as morally due."

La Presse admits there are fewer foreigners in Paris than there usually are, but is uncertain whether this circumstance is to be attributed to the commercial depression, or to the strictness of the formalities now required for travelers as to passports.

The Paris correspondent of the London News says:—

"Two transport vessels left Marseilles for Africa last week—one with 37 and the other with 14 prescribed individuals on board. In the first batch was a professor named Goudereche, for whom George Sand and the Emperor's old nurse solicited pardon in vain."

The Paris correspondent of the Morning Post, writing on the evening of the 22nd ult., says:—

"Count de Persigny has had an audience of the Emperor. His Excellency, who arrived yesterday, is by no means in a good state of health, and probably will not occupy any official position for some time to come."

The Paris Patrie of the 22nd ult., observes:—

"The various interpretations lent to the law (Conspiracy bill of Palmerston) must appear singular in France, where the language of penal laws is so clear and distinct. We may express astonishment that the solution of a question of such paramount importance, which gave rise to a misunderstanding, now appeased, between France and England, which overthrew a ministry, and which, at this very moment, inspires lively anxiety, should depend solely on the interpretation given to the law by a judge. Thus are matters conducted on the other side of the channel. It is not for us to interfere in these customs, nor to seek to improve them, however singular they may strike us. Provided the cause of justice be vindicated, little do we care for the means or the forms that are employed."

The Paris Presse contains some reflections on the development of public opinion in Prussia:—

"Why should so much political importance be attached to the matrimonial alliance with England? Have marriages of this sort ever exercised any great influence on international relations? The Emperor Nicholas had family connections with all Germany: what was the assistance given him by Germany in the day of trial? No, it the present movement in Prussia had for significant and standard a matrimonial alliance with England, it proceeds from a deeper cause. It is the spirit of the nineteenth century bursting into bonds and attaining its natural expansion. Prussia had long opposed this spirit; but she has yielded and others will follow her example."

Official documents have been discovered in Canton, in which it appears that Yeh, during the short period of three months, put to death no less than the enormous number of 20,000 human beings. This is a fact beyond doubt, the documents taken showing the name of every man and woman, and for what they were executed.

Yeh is still on board the Inflexible. He eats and drinks well, but is not very communicative, and says "he is tired of waiting for Lord Elgin, and if he does not come soon, he must really go and attend to the governorship of his province.

Baron Stieglitz of St. Petersburg, has addressed a letter to the Independance Belge, in which he contradicts the reports circulated by sundry journals of his house being largely engaged in the exportation of coin and bullion. He says that his house has not exported a single gold piece on its account, and does not traffic in half Imperials, except at the legal price of 5 roubles 15 kopecks. Whatever exports have been made by him have been for the purpose of covering government bills, so as to check the progressive fall of the exchanges. In this he has succeeded. No favor, he adds, has been accorded to this house, or to any others; and all that he rejoices in is the manner in which his signature has been honored, and thence contributed to facilitate commercial operations at a moment of serious monetary depression.

The tale, invented in a fit of ponderous levity by a German journal, to the effect that thirty thousand Russians are marching on Thibet, is gravely credited by the Paris Pays, which hastens to comment on this "fresh menace to England." It says:—

"We speak with reserve of this movement of troops. Where are they marching to? Why and for whom do they march? What can thirty thousand Russians have to do with the affairs of Affghanistan, Tartary, or the Punjab? We propose these questions without seeking to solve them. They have decidedly more importance than is generally believed, and if it does not become us to deduce direct conclusions from this movement, we may be permitted to address certain truths to our contemporaries on the other side of the channel. We repeat that the state of Asia is profoundly troubled, and is full of dangers which, it strikes us, ought to inspire the liveliest interest in the London journals. We behold three principal circumstances—the permanence of the insurrection in India, the agitation of the Tartars, Mongols, Affghans, Sikhs, and the movement of the Russian troops, which is not sufficiently explained. These are, we believe, sufficiently serious motives to occupy the attention of the English press."

Public attention in Germany is at present occupied by a pamphlet which has just appeared at Stuttgardt under the title of "Napoleon III. und Seine Zeit" (Napoleon III. and His Times.) The fundamental idea of this work is the necessity of the empire in France for the maintenance of order and the balance of power in Europe.

The Augsburg Gazette contains a letter from Vienna, which says:—

"Prince Gortchakoff has recently sent a note to Constantinople for the purpose of calling the attention of the Ottoman Cabinet to article 9 of the treaty of Paris, in which the Porte formally engaged to improve the condition of the Christian population of Turkey. Russia in this document defends herself from the imputation of wishing to interfere in the relations of the Sultan with his Christian subjects or in the internal administration of Turkey, but confines herself to pointing out the disastrous consequences which might result from the non-execution of the firman issued in favor of the Christians."

It is by the request of the Russian government that the Turco-Russian boundary for Asia will be placed before the Conference of Paris, when that meeting takes place

The Glasgow Herald says:—

"This eminent mercantile house (Dennistoun's) is coming finely out of the temporary difficulties in which it was involved by the national crash in November last. The Messrs. Dennistoun have just transmitted a circular of Thursday's date (March 18) to their creditors, intimating that they will be prepared on Wednesday, the 31st instant, to anticipate by payments the second instalment of their engagements on general account, which is due on July 31st next. The Messrs. Dennistoun add:—As it will be obvious to you that we ought not to keep funds unproductive, we take the liberty of stating that, if you do not apply before the 30th of April next for this instalment, we shall assume you will not require payment before it comes due, on the respective dates of July 30th and 31st.

New York, 13th April.

Parliament adjourned over the Easter holidays.

INDIA.

Advices from Bombay, March 9th state that Sir Colin Cambell was before Lucknow at the head of nearly 60,000 troops.—An attack would be made about the 10th. In several scattering encounters the rebels were defeated with great slaughter. The King of Delhi's trial is still in progress.—The statement that he had been convicted and sentenced, is not true. English lady prisoners at Lucknow are reported to be alive, and well treated.

CHINA.

Nothing later from China but interesting details of the last advices. The frigate Mississippi was at Shanghai, and the Minnesota in the Canton River. Martial law was proclaimed at Canton. Commissioner Reed was going to Manilla.

BREADSTUFFS MARKET.

Liverpool, March 31.

Richardson, Spence & Co. quote a very quiet market. Flour neglected; quotations nominal. Philadelphia and Baltimore 22s to 23s; Western 21s to 22s; Ohio, via the north, 23s to 26s, via N. O., 24s to 27s. Wheat in very little demand, and in the absence of transactions nominally unchanged. Prussian offered at a decline of 2d; and western 8s to 8s 2d; white 7s to 7s 6d. Corn also declined one penny, and very dull. Mixed at 29s 6d to 30s for all kinds.

LONDON MONEY MARKET.

Market without change. Business of the Stock Exchange had been dull, and consols had exhibited a drooping tendency; the closing quotations of the 30th was 97¼ for money, and 97¼ to 97¾ for account.—The rates in the discount market ranged from 2¾ to 3 per cent. In American securities a rather active business is reported, but without material change in rates.

Gift Enterprises.

The undertakers of the schemes popularly known as Gift Enterprises have issued manifestoes against the Mayor and police for arresting their fraudulent operations.—They conceive it to be hard that, in this free country, they can not be suffered to delude the people without molestation.

It is, perhaps, doing too much honour to follow them in their line of argument; but, for a moment, let us do so. The reasoning on which these enterprises are defended is this: They claim that the manufacturers of books, rings, bracelets, paintings, and what not make an enormous profit on their wares; that they, dog-in-the-manger-like, keep all this profit for themselves; whereas the gift enterprise people, with sagacious liberality, propose to divide profits with their customers, the share of the undertakers of the enterprise being "planked" in hard cash, while that of the customers is handed over in shape of gifts. For instance, Mr. Ap Williams gets up a gift enterprise. He offers to sell gold rings at a dollar apiece; but, besides the ring, he proposes to give to every customer a good milk cow. And when you say to Ap Williams, "My good fellow, how can you afford to give me a cow as well as a ring for the price of a ring?" he answers, triumphantly, "The reason is that I am sharing profits with you on the ring." In other words, he avows that he makes so enormous a profit on his rings that he can afford to throw cows into the bargain.

Now, according to Ap Williams's own showing, he must be a monstrous rogue.—If his profit on the ring is so great that he can throw in a cow to boot, then every body who wants rings had better deal with Tiffany or Ball and Black, who don't pretend to make such huge profits on their sales. And if Ap Williams does not make so large a profit as to afford him to throw in the cow, then, on the face of it, he intends to break faith with his dealers, and defraud them in some way or another.

This talk about monstrous profits made by manufacturers, and selfishly monopolized by them, is all nonsense. Prices are the product of demand and supply; in other words they are stimulated by consumption and restrained by competition. If there be a general desire for gold rings on the part of the public, persons who have gold rings to sell will realize profits on the sale of them; but those profits will be curtailed by the necessary tendency of each vender to undersell his neighbors. If, for instance, Ball, Black & Co., undertake to make more than a fair profit on gold rings, Tiffany & Co. will immediately undersell them, and drive them out of the market. The very fear of this will prevent Ball, Black & Co. from setting any higher price on their rings than fair trade warrants. So with all other articles of commerce. In every highly active commercial community it may be taken for granted that every common article of merchandize is sold by the regular dealers at as low a price as it can be made for, adding thereto the usual fair commercial profit.

To suppose, therefore, that any new set of dealers can come into the market, and, under pretense of sharing profits with their customers, undersell the entire manufacturing community, is palpably absurd. If Ball, Black & Co. could have been undersold in rings, Tiffany would have done it. If Stewart could have been undersold in dry goods, Beck would have gladly driven him out of the market. If Goupil could have been undersold in pictures, a dozen dealers would have done done a few years since. And parties who now pretend to furnish the public with goods of any kind at the regular prices, and to give a bonus to customers besides, may be boldly set down as intending to defraud.—Harpers Weekly.

Canton continues quiet, and the commissioners are keeping such order in the bombarded city that the wealthy inhabitants are returning, and the place will probably flourish much better under the new rule than under the old, but the misery that exists among the poorer inhabitants is represented as appalling. The Times' special correspondent says:—"The Chinese beggars are the most importunate creatures of their kind. They are not quite so numerous as those of Naples, but they are even more pertinacious, and their sores and leproses are more disgusting. It is a scandal to a city with a score of miles of rich shops that so much misery should exist unchecked. In all other Chinese cities I have found some benevolent institution which distributes rice and medicine. We have not been able to discover any such establishment in action in Canton. Mr. Hewlett, our chaplain, who performs divine service in this pagan purlieu, and exhorts our men in soldier-like discourses that ring like christianized versions of a speech from Thucydides, has this matter in hand. He has established a Chinese hospital and a soup-kitchen—supported by contributions from the scanty pay of the army. I cannot think the poor of Canton have any strong claims upon English charity, but if any of those eccentric Englishmen who feel the wrongs of the Chinese to press upon their consciences choose to send him a subscription he will be glad to receive it."

Some other portions of the long and amusing letters from which this is an extract, are so very good that I feel constrained to quote a few passages lest you should overlook them when going through your files of the Times. For example the writer gives a graphic picture of

YEH ON BOARD THE "INFLEXIBLE."

"It naturally occurred to the Anglo-Saxon mind that he also must want books. The offer was rejected; but Yeh is a religious man, and said nothing about romances. His answer was, 'What should I do with books? All the books that are proper to be read I know by heart.' He quoted Caliph Omar without having ever heard his name. He passes his time in praying to Buddha and telling his fortune. His papers abound in fortune-telling schemes analogous to our 'Sortes Virgilianæ,' or 'Sortes Biblicæ.' One of them is headed, 'Scheme to determine when the Kwangsi Rebellion will Terminate.' The Chinese are very indignant with him for not killing himself. They say 'Eep number one fooley, he no make writee pigeon, he no make fighee pigeon; he number one bad Mandalin; he no cultee (shoot).' The wretched creature seems to have been influenced in his conduct by these fortune-telling papers, which are unfortunate in China, as they are in England. Happier simple Dutchmen. Yet, although the confidential officers of State papers, and their

PLEASE READ.

THE GREAT WONDER OF THE AGE.—A NEW ERA DAWNING upon the ARTS of PEN and INK. A valuable and wonderful discovery.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK.

An entirely new article, by the discovery of which Pen and Ink are rendered useless. It can be used as a

Writing, Copying, or Indelible Ink,

For either of which it can truly be called the ne plus ultra of the kind. For

Writing

It possesses all the beauty of fluid Ink. It is jet black, and so permanent as not to be removed by the strongest oxalic acid. Hence its great value in writing deeds, wills, and other valuable papers. As it will not blot nor crack, it is highly commendable for the use of book-keepers and writers generally. For

Copying,

It works wonderfully. Three, or even four copies can be made at one writing, thus dispensing with the copying machines and the trouble attending it. By a process recently discovered, embroidery patterns, pictures, etc, can be copied accurately on cloth, wood, steel, or any hard substance. For

Printing,

Postmasters and users of stamping apparatus generally value it highly. It matters not how careless the operation, a legible impression is invariably made. Its permanency makes it particularly valuable for stamping clothes.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK

Is put up in packages arranged especially for the travelling community. It can be carried in the pocket, and used at any time. There is no pen required for using it, but it contains in itself everything requisite for persons desiring to correspond with their friends. Every one will find this as represented. As many may be inclined to class the "Portable" as one of the many humbugs of the day, we agree to send a sample package to any one for twenty-five cents, or the same amount in postage stamps. Do you wish for Honourable, Genteel, and Lucrative Employment?

We wish to engage agents for the sale of this celebrated Ink, and can assure all that they will find no better employment or more money-making business than this, and hoping that you will carefully consider it, we await your orders.

TERMS.

To local or travelling agents, we offer the following inducements: For Two Dollars we will send any one two packages of the Ink by mail, and prepay postage on the same; and also we will send full and explicit directions for making, putting up and selling the article.

Any one can make and sell enough to remunerate him for his outlay in a single day.

Pay of the Business.

It is unnecessary to say anything of the money that can be made in this business. It is entirely new and in great demand. Any person can make and put up a thousand packages a day, which will cost three dollars, and which retail at twenty-five cents each, making a profit of two hundred and forty-seven dollars.

☞ No agent will be confined to a single county, but may sell wherever he chooses. You can realize from three to five dollars per day. We wish it understood, that no deviation from the above will be made. Orders solicited.—Address,

ELLIS'
PATENT
ARTIFICIAL STONE.
Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbant, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogreneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone bricks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to di-tinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure in the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or most situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its Beauty.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its Durability.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient prifection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, has reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its Cheapness.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT cheaper, for face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matte is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

N. B.—WANTED—Agents for Sale of Licences or to make and vend in each county.

PLASTER. PLASTER.
VIENNA PLASTER!

THE undersigned begs leave to inform the Farmers of Canada, and all concerned in the use of Land Plaster, that he is now prepared to supply all who may favor him with their patronage with the above named article.

News by the "City of Washington."

DEFEAT OF THE REBELS AT ALUMBAGH.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE FINAL ATTACK ON LUCKNOW.

The new screw steamers, to run on the line between Hamburg and New York, had arrived at the former port from the Clyde. The service of this line is to be a fortnightly one.

The English papers were generally engaged in criticising the bill amending the Government of India; and the new project was, in a majority of cases, regarded as impracticable.

Parliament was not in session, having adjourned for the Easter holidays.

Mazzini had published a lengthy manifesto to the London Morning Advertiser. He addresses his remarks to the Emperor Napoleon. Another lengthy address, by Mazzini, to the Genoese Judges, had also found its way into print.

The Atlantic Telegraph Company had received a letter from the Admiralty announcing that, in conformity with the request of the Company the Agamemnon should be immediately commissioned and commanded by a captain; and also, that two other vessels should be attached to the Agamemnon for the special service on which she is to be employed.

A fire had occurred in Gilbert street, London, entailing the loss of fifteen lives. The parties were asleep in the house at the time, and their escape was cut off by the rapid progress of the flames.

At the Liverpool Police Court, eighteen men of color, composing the crew of the Gertrude, were brought up, charged with mutinous and disobedient conduct during the voyage from New Orleans to Liverpool. Eight of the men were sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment.

The cotton mill of Messrs. Lewis and Edward Williams at Manchester, had been destroyed by fire, entailing a loss of £100,000, and throwing 500 hands out of employment.

It now appears that Allsop, about whose surrender some of the New York journals have been making so much ado, has not been there at all, but in England. A friend, writing on his behalf, protests his entire innocence of the crime laid to his charge. It is not easy, however, to reconcile this assertion with his own letter brought out upon the trial of Bernard, in London.

Pelissier was not expected to leave Paris for London until after Easter.

The Esperance, of Nantes, was to be suspended on account of its political views.

Several persons had been sentenced to fine and imprisonment at Ruffec, France, for attending an evangelical meeting which was held contrary to law.

A meeting of several influential bankers, railway directors and others, had been held at the suggestion of the Minister of Finance, to consider the best mode of reviving public credit. The recommendations involved merely some changes in the conduct of the Bourse.

It was rumoured that the French Emperor would again pay a visit to Queen Victoria, at Osborne this summer.

The persons lately arrested and sent to Sambessa under the new penal code, are, it is said, divided into three classes, and those of the third class are to be permitted to return to France after two months' confinement in the penitentiary at Sambessa.

The trade accounts received from the departments are still unfavourable, and the shipping interests were suffering severely. Some commercial orders had been received from the United States, but in a much smaller proportion than in former years.

The weather continued most favourable for the crops, and wheat has a declining tendency.

The London Morning Post denies a rumour that Persigny had been appointed Minister of State.

The Nord says that military preparations were being urgently pressed on in all the great ports of France.

The Paris Bourse had exhibited much firmness, and the funds had reached the highest point attained for some time.

Cabinet Councils were being held at the Tuileries, presided over by the Emperor, to consider the prevailing depression, and a doubtful report was current that an approach to free trade was to be made forthwith.

The trial of the rioters at Chalons was expected to lead to some serious disclosures relative to secret societies.

The story taken out by the America that the Spanish Government had presented a project of law abolishing Slavery in all the Spanish Territories is not confirmed, and is supposed to be unfounded. It appeared as a telegraphic dispatch in the Brussels Nord.

The Government of Basle has refused to admit the new Consulate which the French Government desired to establish there.—The Federal Government transmitted the refusal in a dispatch to Paris.

The Augsburg Gazette censures very severely the recent policy of the French Government, which seems indeed to have given general dissatisfaction in Germany.

The new French passport system has been extended to Saxony. Every Saxon wishing to travel in France, must procure a passport from the French Legation at Dresden or from the Consulate at Leipsic.

There is considerable domestic agitation in Russia. The reduction of the army has caused great discontent among the retired officers, many of whom have applied for civil employment. It is said that the Emperor meets with secret opposition to his great plan for the abolition of serfdom—but it is [illegible]—" The lower classes are perfectly aware of what is going on, and any owner of 'souls' who might openly [illegible] the measure would be in imminent [illegible] being treated by them as the [illegible] proprietors in Gallicia were treated [illegible] peasants in 1846."

[illegible] don has correspondent of the London [illegible] that the ancient animosity [illegible] revived between the Austrians and the Italians, and the latter seem impressed with the idea that they will soon be called on to maintain their position in Italy at the point of the sword.

The Danish Ministry having made a Cabinet question of the measure respecting the fortification of Copenhagen, the Supreme Council had definitely accepted the project.

IMPORTANT FROM INDIA.

INVESTMENT OF LUCKNOW BY SIR COLIN CAMPBELL.—DEFEAT OF THE REBELS BY SIR JAMES OUTRAM.—SINGULAR REVELATIONS ON THE TRIAL OF THE KING OF DELHI.

The Bombay mails of the 9th of March had arrived at Suez, whence we have the following intelligence by telegraph:

On the 1st of March Sir Colin Campbell reached Alumbagh, and pushed on a heavy force to the Dilkoosha Gardens, within a mile of Lucknow.

Sir James Outram was attacked at the Alumbagh by a large force of the enemy, on the 21st of February, and again on the 25th. On both occasions the rebels were defeated with heavy slaughter, and without loss by the British.

On the 6th of March, Outram, with 6000 men and thirty guns, crossed the Goomtee and took up a position within range on the eastern side of Lucknow. He was immediately attacked, but repulsed the enemy. Gen. Franks had joined the Commander-in-Chief with a column from Goruckpore 4000 strong. The Army before Lucknow is stated to amount to 50,000 men, with 10,000 Cavalry and 120 guns. The general attack was expected to be commenced about the 10th of March. The English ladies, prisoners with the Queen, are reported to be alive and well treated. The columns of Generals Rose and Whitelock were advancing on the Jhansi and Allahabad so as to be in a position to intercept the insurgents in those directions. Gen. Frank's column had a brilliant engagement with large masses of rebels near Shandina, in which 2,800 of the latter were killed or wounded, and all their guns were taken. Some disturbances are reported in the Southern Mahratta country, in Sawunt, Waree and Malabar. The Punjaub was perfectly quiet. The Bombay markets were very active. Imports in good demand. Money continued easy. Freights to Liverpool £1 a £1. 12s. The Times has commenced the publication of letters from its special correspondent in India, Mr. W. H. Russell, who dates from the camp of the Commander-in-Chief. Further telegrams, via Malta, state that the intelligence from Lucknow by telegraph comes down to the 8th of March. The rebels have erected a strong line of defence along the canal, which would require seige artillery. They were alarmed, but likely to fight, although one party was anxious to retreat. The defeat of the rebels, with heavy losses, on this side, is reported at various points.

The report that the Ex-King of Delhi had been convicted and sentenced to transportation for life was erroneous. His trial had not been completed.

The Calcutta correspondent of the London Times, writing on the 22d of February, says:

"The trial of the King of Delhi has now lasted fourteen days. It is a strange business. The King seated on a camp bed, listens to the most damning evidence without attention, but wakes occasionally into fierce excitement as a favourite approaches. I enclose a most singular and somewhat unexpected piece of evidence given by a Christian half-caste woman. It is fatal, and the trial, wretchedly reported, certainly proves three things:

First,—The revolt was instigated by the Shah of Persia, who promised money and troops. His proclamation to that effect was posted over the Mosque gate, and was taken down by order of Sir Theophilus Metcalfe, who, moreover, was warned by John Everett, Christian Rissildar, very popular with the natives, that he had been warned to fly, as the Persians were coming, and that the Mussulmans were exceedingly excited. Sir Theophilus thought the matter one of no importance.

Second,—A paper was produced, addressed to Mr. Colvin by Mohammed Derrish, revealing the whole plot six weeks before it broke out. Mr. Colvin treated the warning as unimportant, and never even reported it to Government.

Third,—The murders of the Europeans in Delhi were committed by order of the King, in the presence of the Royal Family, and by means of the Khassburdars, his special personal guard.

MANSLAUGHTER.

George F. Bull, a man of very respectable appearance, was placed at the bar upon a charge of causing the death of Jonathan McCurday, by striking him two blows with a stick, in the Township of Caledon.

Counsel for the Crown, G. A. Phillpotts and H. Eccles, Q.C.: for the prisoner, —— McGregor, Esq.

Mr. Phillpotts having stated the facts attending the homicide which he was instructed he would be able to establish called—

ARCHIBALD FRANKLIN, who deposed—I reside in the township of Caledon; I knew the late Mr. McCurday; he resided at Belleville, but owned property in Caledon; he came up to Caledon on business about a fortnight before his death; the prisoner had been working at McCurday's mill for about a year; saw McCurday at the mill on the morning of the 4th February; he was working at the flume; after dinner he went into the mill; there was no person with him; he called three other persons besides myself to be witness that he had taken quiet possession of the mill; he put a new padlock on the door, and went to tell the prisoner that he had taken quiet possession of the mill; he opened the door and I assisted in carrying grist to the mill; he afterwards locked the mill; he did not go back to work at the flume; he requested us to wait until the prisoner would come; about half an hour after the grist was ground the prisoner came; I was standing near the saw mill and heard knocks at the mill door; Mr. Orford was the miller who ground the grist; when I heard the blows I came out to ascertain the cause; I then saw the prisoner, his son and Mr. Read entering the mill; this was about four o'clock in the afternoon; the lock had been put on the door about 1 o'clock: McCurday was not there; I went and told him that Mr. Bull had got into the mill; I met him about eight rods from the mill; he had an elm walking stick in his hand; he was in the habit of carrying a walking stick; he went down to go into the mill; I followed; the prisoner was standing in the mill with an axe in his hand; he asked Mr. McCurday what this meant; he answered that he had taken possession of the mill, and that he (Bull) had nothing more to do there and ordered him out of the mill; he refused to go and said, "woe betide you McCurday, or any one who interferes here;" he then asked Mr. Foster if he was going to interfere there; Foster replied in the negative; he then asked Foster to give him his hand and they shook hands; he then spoke to me; McCurday then again ordered Bull to leave the mill; Bull then raised an axe and said he would be the death of McCurday or any man who would interfere; McCurday said that he had got legal advice and that he (Bull) must leave the mill; Bull said he did not care for legal advice, and that if McCurday would throw down his stick, he (Bull) would throw down his; they both did so; Bull then ordered his son to go and start the mill; McCurday forbade him; Bull and son both went to set the mill going; McCurday then took the axe and threw it down stairs; he picked up his own stick and went and shut down the gates; he then ordered Bull to go out of the mill; he would not go; McCurday then struck Bull over the neck, and also struck the son; neither returned the blows, but went out of the mill; when outside of the mill the prisoner said he would shoot McCurday before sundown; and again that he would be the death of him before sundown; prisoner said he was going to get a gun to shoot McCurday; Bull and his son went away together; about five minutes after I saw prisoner and his son in the saw mill; prisoner was whittling a wedge; I next saw him at the door about ten minutes after. (The witness was here shown two walking sticks, and a maple wedge with an iron ferrel on one end about two inches square.) He had the wedge now shown me in his hand; his son was still with him; prisoner told McCurday to come out as he was bound to go in, and then attacked him with his stick; the prisoner struck the first blow, which was warded by McCurday; prisoner struck several blows which deceased warded off; prisoner then caught hold of McCurday's stick and drew him towards him, at the same time striking him a blow on the right side of the head; McCurday fell when the prisoner repeated the blow; I called on him to stop; prisoner said he would kill him, and struck him the second blow; I caught hold of McCurday and drew him into the mill; prisoner came in and asked Foster if he wanted some of the same; I was engaged holding McCurday; he was twisting and writhing on the ground; we got McCurday up to carry him to his house; when we got out of the mill he became conscious and wished to walk, but after setting him down we found he could not stand; he addressed the prisoner saying, "see here my countryman;" prisoner rejoined, "I'll give you countryman you 'old scoundrel, I told you I would be the death of you, and if I have not killed you I wish I had;" while we were carrying McCurday away, prisoner stood brandishing his stick and shouting, "burrah there go the rebels;" McCurday lived to the 14th; he was sometimes sensible and at others not; Dr. McNaughton attended him; I have heard the prisoner repeatedly say he would do the same thing over again; he said so last Monday.

By Mr. McGregor—The deceased was my uncle; I was working at the flume for my uncle; he promised to pay me: don't know who worked the mill on the morning of that day; don't know that I could have prevented the fatal consequences; I was afraid of my own life; deceased did not fall on either the scales or weights.

Salom Foster—Was acquainted with deceased, and the prisoner; recollects the 4th of February referred to by the previous witness. The witness corroborated the evidence of the previous one in almost every particular.

John Orford—I went in company with the deceased; the door was not locked; he opened the door and went in; when he went out he took a lock out of his pocket and put it on the door; shortly after grist was brought, which I ground; I was not present at the affray, but came up as they were carrying McCurday away; prisoner had the stick now shown me in his hand; he came up to me, and said, "woe be to you Orford, if you take an active part, I will serve you just the same, for, if I have not killed him, I intended to do so." I heard him say at the inquest that he intended to shoot McCurday.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor.—I am in possession of the mill at present; have been so for three weeks; ground some grist at McCurday's request on the day of the affray; the door was locked while I was grinding; I refused to grind if left alone.

Dr. McNaughton.—I live about four miles from where the deceased received the injuries; was called to attend him; he had a contused wound on the right side of the head, a little behind and above the ear; could not discover that the skull was fractured, but thought such must be the case, owing to the great hemorrhage from the ear; I considered that the blow of the skull must be injured; deceased appeared favourable until the third or fourth day, when there were symptoms of inflammation of the brain. I assisted at a post mortem examination with Dr. Fotchin on removing the scalp we found that the skull had been fractured.—[The witness produced a portion of the skull by which he explained to the jury the nature of the injury and which he conceived to be the cause of death.]

By McGregor—Deceased was rather above the ordinary size; he was a muscular man; there is a possibility that the injury might have been produced by a fall; my opinion is, that the injury was received from a vertical blow.

This closed the case on behalf of the Crown, when—

Homer Taylor was called for the defence—He said, I knew the deceased for about 30 years; he was a man of mild temper. Had a conversation with him on the morning that he left Belleville for the township of Caledon.

Mr. Eccles said that the Court had nothing to do with conversations.

His Lordship said it was permissible to allow the witness to state what the deceased had told him.

Witness in continuation—Deceased told me at the railway station, in Belleville, that he was going to Caledon, and that he would turn that d——d scoundrel, Bull, out, or come home a corpse; witness has known prisoner for many years; never heard of him being quarrelsome.

Noah Heron proved the execution of a lease of the mill to prisoner for a term of three years.

Jacob Stiles rented a water privilege at the mill from the prisoner, for the purpose of chair making. On the afternoon of the day of the affray, and during the absence of the prisoner, the deceased came into the mill and wished me to look at the flume. After refusing for a time, I at length consented; after leaving the mill, and when a short distrance from it, deceased stopped and said that he had forgotten his crowbar; he returned and entered the mill; he then said he had got possession, and wished me to tell Mr. Bull so. I refused; he again pressed me, and I told him I did not wish to interfere in the matter. He said he had possession, and would keep it or lose his life. Was not present at the affray.—Knows the prisoner for thirty years; he is a quiet peaceable man.

William McDonald—Knew the deceased, and was present in a tavern some two or three days previous to the affray; deceased wanted the prisoner to fight for $5; prisoner refused, when deceased called him a coward; however, there was nothing more than words, and they appeared to part on friendly terms.

His Lordship asked whether the prisoner's Counsel wished to show that the prisoner had been actuated by malice?

Witness went on to relate conversations with the deceased about taking possession of the mill, legal advice, &c., and what he had observed from his own shop, going on in the mill. Witness saw the prisoner run into the saw-mill and return to the grist-mill with a stick in his hand; witness then came out and drew near to the mill; heard the prisoner say, "Come out, for I am bound to go in any way;" they began to spar or parry with the sticks; they parried for a short time, when prisoner caught hold of the deceased's stick with his left hand, and then struck him, as witness thought, on the head; he fell; while falling, prisoner gave him another blow on the knee, which witness thought was the most severe blow of the two; did not hear the prisoner say he intended to kill McCurday; McBush said to him, "You have killed the old man;" he replied, "I am glad of it," but at once said that that was too harsh an expression.

Daniel Bull, son of the prisoner, gave evidence which went to show that the prisoner had acted in self-defence; that the deceased had attacked both the prisoner and himself; witness denied that the prisoner had made use of the language toward the deceased deposed to by the first witness for the prosecution.

Mr. Eccles drew the attention of the witness to discrepancies between the evidence he was now giving and that he gave before the magistrate, and asked the witness which statement was true.

Robert Graham's evidence corroborated that given by the prisoner's son.

Jesse Wells deposed to the prisoner's good character.

Mr. McGregor made an eloquent appeal to the jury on behalf the prisoner, contending that the fatal blows were given in self-defence, and which, if not altogether excusable, still, from the provocations given, the death of McCurday was not attended with such circumstances as should subject the prisoner to the felon's cell. He deprecated McCurday's conduct, which he characterized as uncandid, and did not entitle the Jury to any sympathy for his fate. The prisoner had a lease of the mill for a term of three years, which did not expire until December, 1859; and McCurday, the landlord, used these underhand means to get possession. Mr. McGregor reviewed the evidence at length, and concluded an able speech by imploring the Jury to give the case their calmest consideration; and he felt confident that their verdict would be in favour of his client. He besought them not to be led away by the eloquence of the able counsel (Mr. Eccles) who would follow. In conclusion, he trusted that the jury would come to the same verdict that the coroner's jury had, that is, that the act was committed in self-defence, and returned a verdict of not guilty.

Mr. Eccles replied in an able and argumentative speech, after which

His Lordship summed up the case carefully, and impartially reviewed the evidence, and laid down the law to the jury where parties were entitled to use weapons calculated to inflict dangerous or perhaps fatal wounds; and concluded by leaving the case in their hands.

The Jury then retired at five o'clock, and after an absence of an hour and a half, returned into Court with a verdict of "Guilty of manslaughter," accompanied with a recommendation to mercy.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

TUESDAY, April 13, 1858.

THE USURY LAWS.

Mr. ROSE, in moving the second reading of his bill to regulate the rate of interest, said that the bill as printed and distributed had been received with a great deal of approbation from all parts of the country, though he confessed that it did not appear to give entire satisfaction in any. Still he believed that the measure was in such a shape as, when understood, would commend itself to the exigencies of the country, and it was that one which upon the whole the Government thought alone capable of effecting a fair compromise between the extreme opinions of Upper Canada and the extreme opinions of Lower Canada. In the latter section of the country there was a desire, that no progress should be made; but that the country should go back, and should re-enact the penalties which had been repealed. In Upper Canada, on the contrary, where there was, perhaps, a larger field for speculation, and where money was more valuable than in Lower Canada, the bill rather fell short of the requirements of a very large class. He admitted that the bill might not be the one, theoretically the best; but in his opinion the really best measure was an impracticable one. Such a law as was passed some years ago in England could not be passed in this House, inasmuch as it would not commend itself to the opinions of the people of Lower Canada. The great point, then, was to enable those to whom the money was most valuable to obtain it at such prices as they could afford to pay for it. Another object was to bring into the country foreign capital, which was at present excluded. It could not be denied that the present law was anomalous. By the law passed a few years ago, no matter what amount of interest was stipulated, or even paid, when the creditor came to enforce his claim for the principal, the interest in excess of six per cent must go in reduction of the debt. This evidently placed the honest debtor at a disadvantage as compared with the dishonest one, and he thought it must be admitted that there ought to be no form of contract recognised by the law, which the law would not also enforce. To induce capitalists to bring their money to Canada they must be assured, not only that the borrowers could return their principal, and pay them a good rate of interest, but that the law would compel every man to fulfil his engagement. The bill, then, made an important alteration in this respect. It provided that whenever interest was stipulated for and actually paid, the excess of such interest over six per cent should not be liable to deduction from the principal sum. The law would legalize all payments of interest made in advance. One objection urged against the bill was, that it was contrived in the interest of the banks and the commercial classes, and did not afford any encouragement to the investment of capital in real estate. Others urged that it was not likely to benefit the commercial community, as it would put them into the power of the banks. The banks themselves thought the usury laws should be abolished altogether. As to the objection which tended to restricting the banks to a certain rate of interest higher than at present as a maximum, he would remark, that whenever such a maximum was appointed by law it always became in reality the minimum rate. The banks would contend that the rate fixed was the one the Legislature had sanctioned as the correct one, and would never lend for less. It might be, however, asked, why not then leave the banks as they were? But he felt that at present some classes had not their fair share of the banking capital, which was absorbed in two or three channels, to the detriment of the manufacturing and agricultural interests, and of the general public. Any one acquainted with the mode in which banking operations were conducted, need not be told that at present very few classes indeed benefited from the banking capital, which all went into the hands of persons in a large way of business and established credit, who could afford to make their accounts profitable by leaning at their credit, large deposits which they did not use, or by purchasing exchange, and giving large premiums for it. It was, then, in the interest of the community at large that he was induced to say that these restrictions should be removed. It must be evident that this was necessary in order to make discounts available to those who could pay for them only in the way of discount, for it was manifest that banks could not pay their present dividends by their profits made out of lending money at 6 per cent. The cost of carrying on banking amounted to 2½ to 3 per cent annually on the capital; and though it was supposed that the circulation of the banks was a thing of great value to them, this privilege, as it was called, of coining money, was really a matter of very little profit. The cost of plates and printing and the Government tax amounted to 2 or 2½ per cent upon the issues, and the profit was not more than another 2 or 2½ per cent, or about 1 per cent on the whole capital. The profits on the circulation had been much greater, when it required three weeks to go from Montreal to Toronto, and three weeks more from Toronto to the West; but now the means of travelling were so easy, and people were so well acquainted with the ways of making money profitable instead of hoarding it, that at present the bills issued by the banks came back in a very few days. This was so true that in spite of the high prices of produce and the large expenditures on public works, the circulations of the banks had been constantly decreasing since 1855. The capital of the Bank of Montreal had been increased from £1,000,000 to £1,500,000, and that of the Commercial and other banks in the same proportion; but the amount of the circulation, as shown by the tax paid to the Government upon it, had constantly fallen off. Making allowance for the specie and Government debentures held by the banks, to the amount of which they were exempted from taxation, the amount of the tax had been as follows in several years:—In 1852, £20,600; 1853, £23,000; 1854, £26,000; 1855, £22,000; and how much did the House think in 1857? Only £18,000. And in the first quarter of 1858, the circulation of the largest bank in this country had been £592 less than in 1852, when the same bank had but half its present capital. Under these circumstances it was tolerably plain that circulation could not for the future be rendered very profitable. It was plain, also, that not being able to make their profits out of discounts at 6 per cent, the banks had to look for profits on transactions in bills of exchange. It was notorious that they did so—that if a merchant here presented at a bank half-a-dozen promissory notes of acceptors in the town, and half-a-dozen bills of exchange drawn on Montreal, the former would be thrown out, without any regard to their safety, in order to make the additional profit derivable from exchange. By such a plan, the small trader, the farmer, and the professional man was, of course, shut out, and at the same time great encouragement was given to the business of importation, which in its turn had tended to create an indebtedness towards foreign countries, far beyond what the resources of this country could warrant. Whereas, could a fair profit have been made, larger and more risky operations would have been avoided. Whenever a crisis took place and it was found that some firm which had failed owed the banks £50,000 or £60,000, people asked how the banks had come to jeopardize so large an amount of property. The answer was, that they were forced to do so to make their business profitable. Houses doing a large business could in fact get as much accommodation as they saw fit. During the late crisis, houses with branches in England, from which they generally drew money at 3 or 4 per cent, and who had not applied to the banks for accommodation for years, when exchange fell, instead of continuing to draw it at a cost of 8 or 10 per cent, which was the price of money in England, sent in their ordinary business paper to the banks, who dared not refuse them discounts. But if the banks could have charged the same rate of discount as in England, they would have hesitated to take it, and the margin of capital thus released might have saved many men from ruin. Men, who while money was so high, in general were able to get money at 6 per cent, were naturally induced to go into speculations, and much money was sent to New York, especially for the purchase of leather. These speculations they would have hesitated to undertake if the rate of interest had been greater. But already the Legislature had legalized the exaction of a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent in the case of the Trust and Loan Company.

Mr. GALT—Do they confine their operations to loans for twelvemonths?

Mr. ROSE understood perfectly well that his friend from Sherbrooke meant to say that his bill did not go far enough. However, to resume his argument, he would remind the House that while they had authorized the Trust and Loan Company to take 8 per cent, and while they authorized Railway Companies, Water Work Companies, and Municipal Corporations, to borrow at 7 or 8 per cent, it was not very consistent to keep up the restrictions on other people. We come now to the objection that the bill would prevent loans being made on land, since it restricted the rate to 6 per cent. There is no doubt that if the Government were to pass a bill enabling the lender to take a higher rate of interest than at present, persons to whom money was due on mortgage, would naturally say to their debtor, "You must pay me my principal, or else give me a higher rate of interest." But perhaps they would not be ready to do so, if, in order to get that higher rate of interest, it was necessary to go to the trouble of making a new investment.

Mr. THIBAUDEAU—Your bill comes to the same thing, because you let the parties take an extra interest at once.

Mr. ROSE—Yes; but to do so involves the making a new investment. He had omitted one consideration, which would have its weight with those who thought restrictions should still be continued on the banks—it was that, in times of crisis, such as that just passed, the very slightest relaxation frequently prevented great mischief. The Bank of England had twice been allowed to exceed the issue which was permitted to it upon the Government Loan, and which amounted to £14,000,000. In 1847, this restriction was abolished with the condition that it should not discount at less than 10 per cent, and then the amount of the excessive issue did not exceed £480,000. When people found that they could not get money by paying what it was worth, they felt that the crisis was past, and the panic subsided at once. In 1857, Parliament was summoned expressly to relax the restrictions of the Bank Charter, and again the bank was permitted to issue any amount, provided they did not discount at less than 10 per cent, and the excessive issue then was only about £500,000 per day during the 18 days the relaxation continued. The maximum was but £900,000. Here the banks could not give the small extra accommodation which was needed, because they were restricted to 6 per cent, and now that any issue of their notes would go to New York, and come back on them directly. Now if there were any danger of a combination among the banks or capitalists to enhance the rate of interest, he would be ready to contend for restriction; but he saw no such danger. The banks were amenable to public opinion, and to Parliament, and if they combined they could be punished for conspiracy, just as the bakers might be if they combined to raise the price of bread. He would mention now an illustration of his argument. In the State of New York, where they still retained the obsolete form of usury, the rate of discount was fixed at 7 per cent; but during the crisis discounts fell off from $122,000,000 to $93,500,000—showing a decrease of $27,000,000. What then did the merchants do during this period? They were forced into the street, into the hands of brokers, who charged them two or three per cent per month.

Mr. BROWN—Would the hon. gentleman show how it was that discounts fell off so much during that period, and how his bill would cure the evil?

Mr. ROSE—In England, during the same period, the amount of discount was rising all the time, in the face of the increasing rate of interest, while in the State of New York it was constantly falling.

Mr. DORION—Raising the rate of interest would not do any good for that. It could not give the banks the means of issuing notes to an unlimited extent. The object in England of making the interest high was to restrict the issue.

Mr. ROSE—If they got a higher rate of discount, they could have afforded to import more specie.

Mr. BROWN—How do they get specie?

Mr. ROSE.—By selling exchange, of course. They did not get specie by paying specie for it. The banks here had to pay ten per cent for their money in England, and 4 per cent. for their own agents, and then they had to lend their money here at 6 per cent. It was plain that the community lost the amount which would have been rendered available to them through the credit of the banks by a restriction which prevented the banks from using their credit except at a loss. Another thing that should be remembered in connection with this subject, was the increased value given to money for the use of merchants by the present speedy means of communication.—Formerly a merchant who purchased goods at Toronto, had his capital locked up all the winter without profit. Now, in three weeks he could purchase at Chicago and sell at Liverpool, and thus make a profit of from 30 to 50 per cent in that short interval.—It was plain, therefore, that the merchant could now afford to pay much higher rates than formerly. Mr. Rose concluded by reading the opinion of Mr. Joseph Hume in favor of the abolition of the Usury laws in England; and by stating that owing mainly to his exertions, they had been abolished in that country, at first partially, but wholly in 1854.

Mr. BUREAU thought that it must be admitted in the present circumstances of the country, which had just passed through a commercial crisis, such a bill as the present was at any rate, inopportune; and ought not to have been proposed—and much less to pass. The capital of the banks was $26,000,000, and it was said that the only way to make more capital flow into the country was, by passing the present measure. But for his part he thought there was a conflict between the interests of two different classes of the community. That the banks having the control of all the capital in the country, they could obtain what prices they pleased for the loan of it. In England their circumstances were entirely different. There they had immense capital, so that in fact they were the financiers of the world. Here the capital, on the contrary, was in the hands of a very few persons, and the banks had showed what they could do by diminishing the line of discount from $24,000,000 in one month last year, to $9,000,000 during the corresponding month in the previous year. They had not been able during the crisis to get specie from New York or from England in the ordinary way, and had therefore restricted their business. The effect of the proposed law would be to give a premium to transactions on paper, and to place transactions on land at a discount. It would make all creditors call in their loans, and borrowers on mortgage would be told they could not continue to make use of their creditors' money, without they gave an endorsed bill at twelve months, on which they could be charged higher rates of interest. Some years ago the Premier had procured the passage of a bill giving power to the Trust and Loan Company to lend money at 8 per cent. He saw by their report that this Company were very well satisfied with the business they had done; but what mischief might not be produced if an inducement were given them to call in the £500,000 which they had loaned out all through the country, and this at a time of great loss, when no one could meet his engagements? Look at the increased imposition on the country caused by the increase of interest to be charged by the banks. Their joint capital was $26,000,000. At 1 per cent additional interest, this would give an augmentation of the burdens of the country amounting to $260,000, and at two per cent to $520,000. It was said that the banks made little profit; but he asked how many bank shares were yet undisposed of? He knew a bank that had refused to allow strangers to subscribe for its new capital, in order that it might distribute it among its share-holders.

Mr. ROSE—How many banks have been chartered, but have no capital subscribed?

Mr. BUREAU thought there might be some small Banks, of which that was true. He spoke of the Bank of British North America—at least he thought that was the one. It was necessary, in order to have money to create it, for money was only the representation of value, and in England the large capital possessed by the people had been created by the energy, industry, and intelligence of the people. This country was young—not on a footing with England and its people had been guilty of great extravagances, which had dissipated capital. The importations had, however, diminished in New York by $8,000,000 in one month, which showed how much unnecessary luxury there had lately been, and the economies practised in the same place since September, were estimated at $200,000,000. But the ruin caused by revenue had greatly diminished the revenue. This year the Canadian revenue would fall off $300,000, and it was less than last year by $266,000 in the first three months. The following were the exact figures:

Months.	1857.	1858.	Decrease.
January	$ 64,000	$ 39,000	$ 25,000
February	126,000	104,000	22,000
March	445,000	411,000	34,000
Total	$635,000	$554,000	$81,000

This shows the limited condition of the trade of the country. He would perhaps not have objected to a bill regulating the rate of interest on that current in England.

times against it questioning and expressing [illegible] discussing sponge [illegible] regulating the rate at one or two per cent; but he could not support the present bill, in which, indeed the Solicitor General seemed to have no confidence himself, and which was regarded differently by the different parts of the country.

Mr. CAUCHON thought that this bill would not add to the facilities for borrowing money in small sums, because the true reason why these small transactions were now impossible, was, that they were not worth the attention of capitalists. It would not save Upper or Lower Canada from the difficulties which in his opinion could only be got rid of by a good crop. In Lower Canada, most of the farmers were in debt, and this bill would hand them over to their creditors. He thought, therefore, that it should have been brought in as a ministerial measure; but left an open question, for those who voted for it would find it recoil upon themselves.

The debate was then adjourned till Friday, and the House rose.

Debate resumed.

Mr. THIBAUDEAU regretted that the ministry had pushed the discussion on this Bill, considering that so many French Canadian members were opposed to it, and wanted delay; but as they were determined to do so, it was the duty of those who were opposed to the measure to resist it as well as they could. He considered it as an iniquitous bill, which was invented for the few to reign over the many. He believed that such a bill would be enough to ruin three-fourths of the people of Quebec. In the country parts, too, in Lower Canada, and perhaps in Upper Canada, too, the greater number of the farmers were in debt, and these people now got their accommodation of delay at 6 per cent; but if creditors were allowed to take 8 per cent, of course these debtors would be forced to pay up their money, and probably when it was found that the debtor could not pay, instead of 8 per cent, of which people talked, he would have to pay 10 or 12 per cent, for every one knew that he would consent to pay anything to gain time. The Solicitor General said that his bill would not have this bad effect, but he believed that it was plain that it must be so. There were few properties in towns on which more than 6 per cent could be paid, and in the country it was well known that money was sunk at 6 per cent a constitut. Now, it would be unjust, if the rate of interest were to be changed, not to give these tenders an opportunity by delay to put themselves on the same footing as others. He had no doubt the Solicitor General had made his bill as good as it was capable of being, and if it were not better in the hands of so able a man, it showed how bad it must be by nature. The Solicitor General had said, among other things, that if a higher rate of interest than 6 per cent were not allowed, no more banking capital would be employed; but experience refuted this opinion, for it was well known that as soon as any bank created new stock, that new stock was taken up by the old shareholders and was not permitted to go into the hands of new ones. Experience too, showed that in this country it was impossible for any one to pay more than 6 per cent for money, and those who had tried had always failed. To suppose that such a law would induce capital to flow here from Europe was equally opposed to the lessons of experience, for money had been often at 2½ to 3 per cent in England, and yet it had not been attracted to Canada by the high rate of 6 per cent. The Solicitor General thought the banks could have discounted more through the crisis if they could had charged higher rates, but for his part, he believed this quite fallacious. Nor did he agree with the Solicitor General in thinking that facilities would be given to the retail trade by the enactment of this law; for he did not see how the small traders could afford to pay more than the large ones. The banks had already privileges enough, without granting them more. They had accepted their acts of incorporation just as they were and ought not now to want them changed. He concluded by saying that he had complained of the speed with which the discussion of the bill had been pushed forward; but he hoped that the real intention of the Government was only to have it discussed as long as possible and then postponed till next session in order to have the judgment of the country upon it. Unless this postponement were granted ministers would assuredly lose much of the sympathy which they now had in Lower Canada, where the people believed that such a change in the law would ruin one-half of them. Nor did he believe that the farmers of Upper Canada, whatever the speculators might be, were in favour of such a law.

Mr. CHAPAIS—Upper Canada is in favour of it.

Mr. THIBAUDEAU—Well, let the principle of the Double Majority be applied, and let Upper Canada have it for herself.

Mr. LORANGER held that to pass the law for a section as Mr. Thibaudeau desired, would be to do away with all government together, for the Government must be carried on by each section, and for each section. He complained of the manner in which Mr. Thibaudeau, who always professed confidence in the Ministry, as constantly condemned their principles and their measures, and particularly of the manner in which he had spoken of the present as an iniquitous bill, made in the interest of the few to ruin the many. If there was no reason to find fault with the measure being hastened, because there had been no considerable demand on the part of members for its postponement, but it was in the nature of a measure like that intended to meet a dangerous crisis of society, that the Government should press the remedy before the evil became incurable. That there had been a very dangerous crisis was undoubted, and also that the Ministry were expected to find a remedy. It must also be agreed that the present rate of interest was not one that met all the present necessities of the country. Those who had any sound commercial notions must admit that, and he laid it down as a truth, without fear of contradiction. Throughout the world scientific men had investigated this subject, and he did not fear to say that they were unanimous in recommending the relaxation of the laws which restricted the rate of interest that could be charged for money. The Government then knowing that the Usury Laws were injurious, and must be repealed, proposed the present bill; but the bill in no way changed the present rate of interest, nor did it legalize the stipulation of any rate of interest whatever. It simply relaxed the law with respect to transactions in commercial paper, having less than twelve months to run. For everything else the rate remained as at present. If a farmer borrowed money on mortgage, say stipulation of more than 6 per cent was null, though the old penalties were abolished, and though an excess of interest paid voluntarily and in advance could not be recovered back again. He would not then discuss as a general proposition the question whether money was merchandize or not. He thought that formed no part of the problem now, only remarking that if it were admitted that money were merchandize like any thing else, it would follow that any rate of interest might properly be stipulated. But with regard to what the hon member for Portneuf had said about persons who owed money, and others who had sunk money on constituts—all that might be applicable, if the rate of 6 per cent were to be abolished, but most of the transactions in the country were on mortgage, and these transactions were not withdrawn from the operation of the existing law. How many habitans were there in the hon. member's county who came under this law—how many who do business at the banks? He did not believe there was one in a hundred.

Mr. THIBAUDEAU did not believe there was one.

Mr. LORANGER—Well then he had exaggerated the number who might be affected by the permission to charge more than 6 per cent. on promissory notes.

Mr. CIMON—He is affected indirectly, for what interest the merchants pays he will charge.

Mr. LORANGER—But though the habitant is not directly affected, the habitant would be directly benefitted by a change in the law; for if the merchant could not get discounts he had to press his debtor, and thus the habitant would be placed in difficulty and subjected to expense. To suppose then that the Bill would injure the rural population was a very great error indeed. He contended, moreover, that the Bill was in no respect opposed to the ancient laws, which regulated the rate of interest. There were two kinds of money—metallic or real, and paper or fictitious.—Metallic money was a representative of all kinds of property, and was therefore not itself property or merchandize. But to facilitate transactions another kind of money had been invented in the shape of promissory notes, and as these depended on the credit of the person who made them they had only a relative value—they were plainly merchandize and might be disposed of at the prices agreed on. When money was lent upon mortgage it was lent securely, and therefore the rate was fixed at 6 per cent; but when it was lent upon promissory notes there was a certain risk, and in consideration of this risk, the lender was to be allowed to charge a larger rate of interest. It had been said that the Bill was made for the benefit of the banks. On the contrary it was made for the interest of commerce, and it was easy to see that the banks would not be able, merely because they were allowed to do so, to charge extravagant rates. A banker having a large capital, had to employ it, or it produced nothing, and he would find no borrowers, if he demanded more than the loan was worth. There were several banks in the Province, and they would of course compete with other, and so keep the rate of interest at an equilibrium. Money, like other articles, would always find its value, and could never bring more than the market rate. What happened at the last crisis? The banks did not lend at six per cent., because they were allowed to charge no more; but they got ten or twelve per cent. by the intervention of brokers and other means, and the borrower had to pay all the additional expenses arising out of a complicated instead of a simple transaction. The laws against usury did not prevent the existence of usurers, but it was very rare to hear of any one being punished, and thus no one was prevented from committing the offence. However, as the Government had no desire to act for the sake of the banks, but for the trade of the country, they would be ready to withdraw that part of the Bill if the sense of the House was found to be opposed to it.—There were of course many different opinions upon the various clauses. Some thought the proposed change would not go far enough. Others thought it went too far; the views of all being probably coloured by their peculiar interests; but he believed that their was a considerable unanimity in the approval of the principle of the measure.

Mr. GALT regarded the Usury Laws as the relicts of an old and by no means wise system. There was a time when the Legislature undertook to regulate the price of other articles, besides money, but those laws had been abolished. He believed any attempt by legislation to determine the rate at which a person having money, should loan it, would be inoperative, and the more restrictions placed upon the free exchange of money, the greater would be the loss to the borrower; the more he would have to put into the pockets of unscrupulous persons. (Hear, hear.) For these reasons he could not say that he approved of the bill, it did not go far enough (hear, hear,) at the same time, he would not vote against its second reading. He would much have preferred that the bill should have been introduced by the Inspector General; a question involving such an important change was within the sphere of our Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was the more satisfied such a course would have been advantageous, because the Solicitor General in introducing the bill said it was not the one which if left to himself he would have introduced. He said he was in favor of the total abolition of the Usury Laws. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. Galt) would be very glad to know what influence had produced the present bill? He understood the hon. gentleman (Solicitor General) to say it was a compromise between Eastern and Western Canada. Now, either a principle was sound, or else it was unsound. If it was desirable to keep up a restriction upon money we might adhere to the present law; but if restriction was bad, then the bill was bad so far as it imposed restriction upon money. (Hear, hear.) The law now proposed, if he understood it correctly, repealed all the Usury Laws in regard to transactions under twelve months, and continued them over twelve, providing at the time of making the contract for the loan of money the parties did not come to an understanding that an additional rate should be paid. If the Government were prepared to go at length they would have done much better to have gone the whole length and repealed the law altogether. Many persons desired to place their money in such investments that it could be made annually available. Under this law it could not be done. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the effect of this measure upon the banks, he rather regretted that his hon. friend had dwelt so fully upon that. His (Mr. G's.) impression was that the House was not called upon to legislate for the interests of the banks. If those institutions had not found it profitable to employ their capital hitherto, he did not think they had a right to come to this House and ask an alteration in the laws for the purpose of giving them beneficial employment. A petition had been presented to the House by the banks, in which they said that if it were possible by a repeal of the Usury Laws for the banks to extend their facilities over a wider field, the petitioners believed that capitalists would seek investment in Canadian banks, and so loan money to the farmers, &c. This he did not believe was the practice of the banks any where except those perhaps established under the names of agricultural banks. He did not believe capital put into banks could be used advantageously on long loans, nor did he believe it would be of any use for farmers to go to the banks for accommodation at the time the ordinary customers of the banks were refused. This being the case, he would consider the proposed law solely as to the effects it would have on capital for the purposes of commerce. By the bill, loans on real estate were fixed at six per cent. It had been said that there would always be an indisposition on the part of persons who had loaned money on real estate to bank investment, if the Usury Laws were abolished. It was a great mistake to suppose that the repeal of those laws would enable money lenders to exact a greater rate of interest. There was always a certain class of persons who wished to invest their money in such a shape that it would be secure, and yield a certain amount of interest. He did not believe as a general rule that the rate of interest would be higher than now. At present if money was worth more than six per cent, no man could get it for less, the only alternative was, to go without it. The object of repealing the Usury Laws was to enable parties to get money for what it was worth, to get it for this they were certainly inoperative. It was denied that those who now owed sums of money, would have to pay a higher rate. They might be required so to do; that was to say if those holding owed money in the present state of the law, and this money was worth more than six per cent, no creditor would reserve a mortgage on the same terms; but would say rather pay me back money, or else give me what it is worth. The only [illegible] was that instead of obliging these unfortunate persons to go to money lenders and usurers, instead of obliging them to evade the law and to pay a great deal more than the real value of money, they were able to get it at the lowest market price, and he believed landed security rarely required more than six per cent. Mr. Galt then went on to argue, that those who mortgaged those who borrowed money at that rate could not be of long duration. (Hear, hear.) In regard to the banks, if they were to make the loan of money free, they ought to have safeguards to check the inducements they would have to issue more money.—Some restrictions ought to be placed upon that. An inconvenience might arise from the repeal of the Usury Laws at a time like this, when the market rate of interest was considered higher than the legal rate. Many debtors now held money at the legal rate, and as soon as the new law came into operation, their creditors would come down upon them and say—you must give me ten or twelve per cent interest, or pay me them to get charters. He thought that, in repealing the Usury Laws, they should reserve to themselves the right of dealing with those clauses in the Bank charters, which gave the Banks the power of making the money circulation of the country. He did not think this bill went enough. The object of the repealing of the Usury Laws was to attract capital, and it was obvious that, as wise men, they ought to place as few restrictions as possible on the mode of employing that capital. The present Bill merely allowed an unlimited rate of transactions under twelve months, but it was manifest that foreign capital could not be attracted to this country for temporary use. It came all, it would be to seek more permanent investment, for people would not send out money from England to take up our ordinary commercial paper. The relaxation, therefore, imposed by this Bill, would aid very little in introducing foreign capital, the great object that was sought, except as an addition to our present banking capital, it thought they might very safely have followed the example of England, and proceeded at once to do away with the Usury Laws altogether. And in another point they might copy the example of England with advantage. There, before such objects were legislated upon, the advice of parliamentary Committees composed of men in every most experience on the subject was taken, and he hoped the Solicitor General would forgive him for suggesting that such a Bill as this, after being read a second time, should be referred to a committee of the members having most acquaintance with monetary matters. This committee could decide between the views put forth on the one hand by gentlemen from Lower Canada that the Bill went too far, and the views put forth on the other hand by those who like himself, thought it did not go far enough. They would be able also to consider deliberately the arguments offered in this prayer by the banks, which were in favor of a total repeal of the Usury Laws. They had yet many weeks of the session before them, and there would be time enough for the committee to report and action be taken But he did not think the Government should have taken the responsibility on themselves deciding that they ought not to go the full extent in legislating on this subject, in should vote for the second reading of the Bill, with a view to its being afterwards sent to a Committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the people of Canada would not be satisfied with such committees as were appointed in England, where there was scarcely a person to be found who had not an interest in making money dear. Upper and Lower Canada differed respecting principle, but the Government did not bring the measure forward that a principle might be discussed. As an abstract principle his views were in favor of Usury Laws being done away with altogether. It was stated by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, that the banks were to be benefitted by it. For his (Mr. Buchanan's) part, he thought it would be safer for the banks to be restricted. A compromise was necessary, for while Lower Canada was in favor of a low rate of interest—say six per cent, Upper Canada appeared determined to have 8 per cent; and no better bill could have been brought into the House. He disagreed with the hon. member for Montmorenci, in saying that this should be an open question, and he thought the Government had manifested a great deal of moral courage in taking the course which they had pursued. Representation by Population, and questions of that nature could be postponed to a future day; but this was a matter upon which prompt and decisive action was required. It was not to be supposed that a more liberal measure than this could be carried through the House. Its objects and end were to increase the supply of money, and thereby make money cheaper and more easily accessible.

Mr. DORION felt some embarrassment in speaking on this question, and the more so because of the differences of opinion which had been expressed upon the subject, not only in the House, but by people throughout the country. It was not, therefore, surprising that they should be a little perplexed as to what ought to be the proper measure to pass upon it. He considered that the view of those who went for unlimited freedom in money lending was the best. (Hear, hear.) He had before now expressed the opinion on the floor of this House that a person having capital to invest, ought to be allowed to deal freely with it, and lend it at such rate as he could obtain for it, just as much as the owner of the flour trade go to Montreal for accommodation, and they were therefore obliged, when they had forwarded their produce there, to sell it for whatever they could get. Lately, there had been persons in the trade who gave proper security to the banks, and were therefore enabled to bring their produce to the best market. He would not be willing to see this state of things renewed. To prevent it, and to prevent the banks from telling the agriculturalists or manufacturers that they could not grant them aid because they could not draw bills payable at a distance, he would fix the rate at 8 per cent. He approved of the views of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, and would like to see a Committee which would collect the best opinions in Upper and Lower Canada, to put a true estimate on the value of money; but would not like to see the present Bill postponed.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved that the debate be adjourned till Tuesday next.—Carried.

Mr. BROWN asked if it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the debate on Tuesday?

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD replied that it was.

Thursday, April 15th.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Attorney General MACDONALD moved the second reading of the bill for abolishing imprisonment for debt. He said that a great and general demand had been made for a repeal of the existing law which permitting imprisonment for debt on the simple affidavit of the creditor, had made the position of every debtor one of great uncertainty. No one, however willing to pay his debt, was safe from being put under arrest, and thus subjected to the necessity either of finding bail if he had power to do so, or of being separated from his family. To avoid this calamity persons had frequently had voluntarily to leave the country. He believed that in most cases the persons making the affidavits on which debtors were imprisoned had done so in good faith, but it ought not to rest on the mere judgment of any creditor, that a man was about to leave the country and defraud his creditors, whether he should be arrested or not. One provision of the law he was about to introduce was to make the sum for which a debtor could be arrested £25 instead of £18, the value of money having very much changed since the existing law was enacted. It was proposed further that all persons now in custody should be discharged on coming before a judge and making a disclosure of their effects. While there was to be this great advance towards the abolition of imprisonment for debt, the law would also take into consideration the case of creditors. There had been a law passed so long ago as the 4t. William 4th, which made a fraudulent transfer of property a misdemeanour punishable by fine and imprisonment. This law had been inadvertently repealed, but it was intended by the present bill to restore it, and he thought it would be admitted that this was right, and that a person who put away his property for the sake of defrauding his creditors, deserved punishment just as much as the man who committed larceny. The law of William 4th had not been often put in force, but it was a check upon fraud, and had in some cases been employed with very good effect. It also seemed to him that taking goods across the lines, or selling them and taking the money across, was just as great an offence as the one last mentioned. He proposed to make that also a misdemeanour. At present the question whether a party should be arrested depended very much upon the nerve or the conscience of the debtor, and it happened in some cases that creditors living in the United States, and who had sent large quantities of goods across—such, for instance, as patent medicines—had come into the Province and had sworn they believed that every one of their debtors were going to leave the country. In such cases the judges always discharged the parties; but not before a great part of the wrong had been done. The civil form of the action, in all these cases would still be continued, and it would be necessary to satisfy the judge of the correctness of the facts, just as it is now to satisfy a magistrate of the facts on which a writ issued against a criminal. The civil form of this process was to be preserved, and the application might be made either to the Court or to a single judge, who, upon being satisfied that good cause existed for so doing, might issue his process to arrest the debtor. After the arrest shall have been made, the party might come before the judge, and have his case heard, and the judge would decide as once whether he should be held to bail or committed to jail. This law was like that which prevailed in Lower Canada and in England, where the judges required strong evidence to satisfy them of the fact that the debtor was really about to defraud his creditor. The principle then laid down would be applicable as well after judgment as on arrest process. However, as it had been found that committing the debtor on written interrogatories required a satisfactory way of obtaining the facts which the creditor desired to know, inasmuch as it gave him an opportunity to sit down and answer the questions rather with a view to his own purposes, and to evasion than to give correct information respecting his affairs, it was provided by the bill that after judgment he might be brought up before the judge and examined viva voce on such subjects as a debtor was bound to disclose for the benefit of his creditor. The bill further provided that any assignment of personal effects by the debtor intended to favour one creditor, or give one creditor a priority over others should be null, while it protected voluntary assignments made for the benefit of all the creditors. There was of course some difficulty to accomplish this object without interfering with bona fide sales, and the bill, therefore provided that the restraint should apply only to persons insolvent, and should not extend to sales made in the ordinary way of business. The bill also made illegal all confessions of judgment given by way of preference which were, in fact, the worst kinds of preference, because they enabled the sheriff to sweep off everything the debtor might have. Cognovits made voluntarily, then, and without the pressure of an action or a threatened action, were to be void. Finally, as it had been found that parties who, when they saw their creditors were about to seize their debts and collect them, destroyed their papers and books. This very shameful description of fraud was to be included in the acts to be looked on as misdemeanours.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD approved in some respects of the principle of the bill now introduced. There had been a cry for a reform of the law of imprisonment for debt from all parts of the country, though he believed the agitation of it had been recently confined almost wholly to one part of Upper Canada. It was a cruel case that a man should be subject to arrest after assigning everything that he had got, and this was the case in an instance in which he was concerned, and where the debtor was on the limits at Perth, and unable to escape unless he went to gaol for some time, and swore that he was not worth £5. A person who assigned all his goods for his creditors' benefit should not be liable to imprisonment. He was therefore, in favour of the abolition of imprisonment for debt, except in some cases; but the law in England was not a good rule here. England was in a very different position from this country, inasmuch as debtors could not there escape readily to a foreign country. This sort of escape was very easy on our extended frontier, and the consequence believed of the bill now introduced would be that while the creditor was satisfying the judge that the debtor should be arrested, the latter might escape. Then with respect to confession of judgments, it was said in the bill that no party who was insolvent was to be allowed to make these confessions: but the difficulty was to know whether he were insolvent. In the bankrupt law several acts were mentioned which were held to establish bankruptcy: but here there was nothing of the sort, and it would be very hard indeed to say whether there was insolvency or not. Again, it was said that these confessions were not to be made except under pressure from a law suit. That, he thought, would give rise to collusion, which might be easily practised for a person who intended to make an assignment might easily obtain the issue of a writ against him. The great difficulty, however, in carrying out this law was that there were not judges in this country who could resist the influence of intimacies, and friendships in their own neighbourhoods. Under the bankrupt law there were numerous fraudulent assignments; but he appealed to those who had experience in the matter, whether they ever heard of any one being punished for it? If so, there were very few cases indeed of it. So with respect to this bill, the debtors would be brought to answer interrogatories before county judges who had been long in friendly intercourse with them, and who besides being under the influence of that intercourse were also naturally subject to the effect of popular sympathy in the neighbourhood. Having said so much, he admitted again that there was a call for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, though it was generally made in favour of persons in that part of the country which was constantly described as being the only part of Upper Canada where there was any prosperity, or enterprize, or industry. It was precisely in that part of the country where people were found groaning in prison, and applying to that House for relief; while in the eastern part of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, the people were making steady advances in spite of the crisis. He concluded by expressing an opinion, however, that whatever was done, the rights of creditors should be protected, for of late all the legislation had been in favour of the debtor.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER made a few observations to the effect that, at the time when the law abolishing imprisonment for debt had been passed in Lower Canada, he thought it should also be applied to Upper Canada; but that was prevented by the influence of certain members from Upper Canada of the legal profession. With regard to the other branches of the bill intended to prevent the fraudulent granting of judgments and assignments, it was a change in the law which had been long called for in Lower Canada, where the merchants trading with Upper Canada had long suffered from the fraudulent transfer of property to their detriment. He congratulated the hon. Attorney General on being the author of this useful bill.

Mr. DUNKIN said the measure was one which appeared to him not to go far enough. He could not agree with some of the views of the member for Cornwall. He thought it desirable to protect the debtor, when he gave up all his property. As he had said on a previous occasion, he thought the worst use a man could be put to was to put him in gaol. He must confess that he had expected a measure which would have gone further than this, in relieving debtors from that position. In his judgment the measure was neither good for either creditor or debtor, and he reserved to himself the right of making suggestions for improving it, at a future stage.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said he concurred in the views of the hon. member for South Oxford, much more nearly than in those of the hon. member for Cornwall. In drawing up the measure his only doubt had been whether it did not fall short of the protection that should be extended to the debtor. However, after the fullest consideration, he had not thought it advisable to go further. If he were to allow his own feelings to guide him, he would be disposed to do away with imprisonment for debt altogether. But in that case a great means of preventing and punishing fraud would be done away with. They all agreed that a fraudulent debtor was a criminal, but a fraudulent design of leaving the country was not so susceptible of proof as to make it advisable to constitute it a statutory crime. Only a strong probability could be established and that could not be made a misdemeanor. If a party fraudulently transferred his goods, he could be punished for a criminal, but there was a distinction between that and establishing a probability that it was a man's design to leave the country. In that case, the creditor had to swear that so-and-so was due him £25 or upwards and show reasons to the judge for entertaining the strong conviction that the man was about to leave the country without a view of defrauding him and his other creditors. And the judge must be satisfied on this point before issuing his warrant. He thought this would be a sufficient protection for the creditor. As to making a distinction, as regarded fraudulent assignments, between lands and goods, the object had been to protect merchant creditors, who mainly suffered from fraudulent assignments—a debtor actually handing over the goods of one merchant creditor to pay the other merchant creditor who was preferred. But lands seldom formed the assets of merchants, and it was not desirable to have any measure, the effect of which would be to endanger the conveyancing of lands.

Mr. MACKENZIE expressed his disappointment that the Bill did not abolish imprisonment for debt, but only raised the limit to £25. In New York State, a man could not be arrested for debt, although he might be for fraud. The hon. member for Cornwall had been more lenient to debtors on a former occasion, when he assisted to pass the Bill which enabled all be-debtors in Belleville and other places to pay their debts at a sixpence a-head. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was the only member of the House who voted against the Bill, which the Attorney General himself discovered the necessity of getting repealed at the very commencement of the following session.

Mr. WALLBRIDGE said that imprisonment for debt, properly speaking, did not exist in Canada. The statute was evidently framed with the design that the arrest should only be for fraud, for the design of leaving the Province with intent to defraud the creditor. The principle of this Bill did not extend one iota, in this respect, beyond the principle of the present statute. Some of the details only were altered. It provided that the judge should be satisfied as to the fraudulent design of the debtor. Could he be satisfied in any other way than by the affidavit?—which would amount to the same thing as the present state of the law. He considered that imprisonment for debt should be entirely abolished, and that it should not be retained on the pretext that a man was to leave the country, or on any other. He understood there was no imprisonment for debt in Lower Canada.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER said a debtor could be arrested in Lower Canada, on a deposition, not that he was to leave the Province of Lower Canada, but that he was to leave the Province of Canada. No debtor from Upper Canada, being in Lower Canada, could be arrested.

Mr. BROWN said that the law generally enacted to imprisonment for debt. It merely intended that where a debtor owed a large sum, and it was certain clearly that he was about to leave the country fraudulently with his property, and leave the country, robbing his creditors, then he might be arrested. But, unfortunately, it had been applied for the arrest of parties never contemplated by the Act. In Toronto, such a thing as imprisonment under this Act was scarcely known, but in other parts of the country, the idea prevailed that, in order to get a debtor arrested, it was quite proper to make an affidavit that he was likely to leave the country—so much so, that in some localities, whenever a man became embarrassed, he was almost sure to be arrested. The consequence was that, to avoid arrest, such parties fled the country, and the very evil was created against which the Act was meant to provide. As to the exemption which had been drawn by his hon. friend from Cornwall, between the East and the West, he believed that quite as many in the East had taken advantage of the Insolvency Law as in the West; and if they took into account the amount of business done, he was sure the proportion of insolvency and bankruptcy in the East was quite equal to what it was in the West.

After the recess,

Mr. BROWN resumed his remarks. He repeated that the objection to the present law was not so much against the law itself as against the way in which it was worked. The result of it was, that when a man was taken under an ordinary capias, all his creditors came upon him, his creditors generally, and the next place he might occupy was the gaol. At the same time he might say that the object of the clause had been to prevent a most dishonest practice. When the persons who had given or endorsed a note desired delay, all he had to do at present, was to put on the record a deliberate falsehood, that he had paid it, or did not get notice, or that it was not protested in time, or some other pretext, and he was thus enabled to get it thrown over till next Court. It was a disgrace to a civilized community that such a practice should exist. The clause in question cured that, and put all on the same footing as was now occupied by the honorable holder of a note who would not resort to such practices, and against whom an execution might issue within six days after judgment was recorded. However he believed there was a general feeling that, in consequence of the general commercial panic, the operation of this clause should be postponed for a year.

Mr. BROWN quite agreed with the Attorney General as to the evil of entering these false pleas, but he would recollect that when his bill was before the House, hon. gentlemen on his (Mr. Brown's) side urged that a longer time ought to elapse after the judgment was signed before execution issued. In England Scotland, and Ireland, an execution could be issued in a few days after judgment, but there the debtor had that protection, that, if he was unduly pressed, he could say—"I will go into bankruptcy, all my funds will be locked up, it will be a long time before you get anything, and you will not get so much as if you give me time."

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD—A party here may protect himself in the same way. He can say—If you press me I will make an assignment for the benefit of all my creditors.

Mr. BROWN went on to say that, looking at the way in which commercial affairs were conducted on this Continent, he thought that some mode of settlement should provided for the honest debtor. In this country at the present moment there were many persons suffering severely from the want of such a law. Having been led into rash speculations, or having trusted parties who were now unable to do what they had promised, they were now in a position in which there was no prospect for them but that of total ruin. He hoped the Bill now before us prepared to consider some Bill which would give such parties relief.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said that, while the Government did not propose to introduce a Bankruptcy Bill, eo nomine, he had now under consideration the principle of the cessio bonorum which obtained in Scotland—that for the honest debtor, clearly and beyond a doubt surrendering everything he had in the world, there might be some means of enabling him to become a useful member of society. He did not promise to introduce such a Bill,—he only had it under consideration.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD said that if a Bill such as the hon. gentleman spoke of were brought in and passed during the present crisis, every one would take advantage of it, and it would then be found that they had been too precipitate.

Mr. BROWN said his friend forgot that we had been for many years without a Bankruptcy Bill, ruining him and his other creditors. And the judge must be satisfied on this point before issuing his warrant. He thought this would be a sufficient protection for the creditor. As to making a distinction, as regarded fraudulent assignments, between lands and goods, the object had been to protect merchant creditors, who mainly suffered from fraudulent assignments—a debtor actually handing over the goods of one merchant creditor to pay the other merchant creditor who was preferred. But lands seldom formed the assets of merchants, and it was not desirable to have any measure, the effect of which would be to endanger the conveyancing of lands.

Mr. MACKENZIE expressed his disappointment that the Bill did not abolish imprisonment for debt, but only raised the limit to £25. In New York State, a man could not be arrested for debt, although he might be for fraud. The hon. member for Cornwall had been more lenient to debtors on a former occasion, when he assisted to pass the Bill which enabled all be-debtors in Belleville and other places to pay their debts at a sixpence a-head. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was the only member of the House who voted against the Bill, which the Attorney General himself discovered the necessity of getting repealed at the very commencement of the following session.

Mr. WALLBRIDGE said that imprisonment for debt, properly speaking, did not exist in Canada. The statute was evidently framed with the design that the arrest should only be for fraud, for the design of leaving the Province with intent to defraud the creditor. The principle of this Bill did not extend one iota, in this respect, beyond the principle of the present statute. Some of the details only were altered. It provided that the judge should be satisfied as to the fraudulent design of the debtor. Could he be satisfied in any other way than by the affidavit?—which would amount to the same thing as the present state of the law. He considered that imprisonment for debt should be entirely abolished, and that it should not be retained on the pretext that a man was to leave the country, or on any other. He understood there was no imprisonment for debt in Lower Canada.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER said a debtor could be arrested in Lower Canada, on a deposition, not that he was to leave the Province of Lower Canada, but that he was to leave the Province of Canada. No debtor from Upper Canada, being in Lower Canada, could be arrested.

Mr. BROWN said that the law generally enacted to imprisonment for debt. It merely intended that where a debtor owed a large sum, and it was certain clearly that he was about to leave the country fraudulently with his property, and leave the country, robbing his creditors, then he might be arrested. But, unfortunately, it had been applied for the arrest of parties never contemplated by the Act. In Toronto, such a thing as imprisonment under this Act was scarcely known, but in other parts of the country, the idea prevailed that, in order to get a debtor arrested, it was quite proper to make an affidavit that he was likely to leave the country—so much so, that in some localities, whenever a man became embarrassed, he was almost sure to be arrested. The consequence was that, to avoid arrest, such parties fled the country, and the very evil was created against which the Act was meant to provide. As to the exemption which had been drawn by his hon. friend from Cornwall, between the East and the West, he believed that quite as many in the East had taken advantage of the Insolvency Law as in the West; and if they took into account the amount of business done, he was sure the proportion of insolvency and bankruptcy in the East was quite equal to what it was in the West.

After the recess,

Mr. BROWN resumed his remarks. He repeated that the objection to the present law was not so much against the law itself as against the way in which it was worked. The result of it was, that when a man was taken under an ordinary capias, all his creditors came upon him, his creditors generally, and the next place he might occupy was the gaol. At the same time he might say that the object of the clause had been to prevent a most dishonest practice. When the persons who had given or endorsed a note desired delay, all he had to do at present, was to put on the record a deliberate falsehood, that he had paid it, or did not get notice, or that it was not protested in time, or some other pretext, and he was thus enabled to get it thrown over till next Court. It was a disgrace to a civilized community that such a practice should exist. The clause in question cured that, and put all on the same footing as was now occupied by the honorable holder of a note who would not resort to such practices, and against whom an execution might issue within six days after judgment was recorded. However he believed there was a general feeling that, in consequence of the general commercial panic, the operation of this clause should be postponed for a year.

Mr. BROWN quite agreed with the Attorney General as to the evil of entering these false pleas, but he would recollect that when his bill was before the House, hon. gentlemen on his (Mr. Brown's) side urged that a longer time ought to elapse after the judgment was signed before execution issued. In England Scotland, and Ireland, an execution could be issued in a few days after judgment, but there the debtor had that protection, that, if he was unduly pressed, he could say—"I will go into bankruptcy, all my funds will be locked up, it will be a long time before you get anything, and you will not get so much as if you give me time."

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD—A party here may protect himself in the same way. He can say—If you press me I will make an assignment for the benefit of all my creditors.

Mr. BROWN went on to say that, looking at the way in which commercial affairs were conducted on this Continent, he thought that some mode of settlement should provided for the honest debtor. In this country at the present moment there were many persons suffering severely from the want of such a law. Having been led into rash speculations, or having trusted parties who were now unable to do what they had promised, they were now in a position in which there was no prospect for them but that of total ruin. He hoped the Bill now before us prepared to consider some Bill which would give such parties relief.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said that, while the Government did not propose to introduce a Bankruptcy Bill, eo nomine, he had now under consideration the principle of the cessio bonorum which obtained in Scotland—that for the honest debtor, clearly and beyond a doubt surrendering everything he had in the world, there might be some means of enabling him to become a useful member of society. He did not promise to introduce such a Bill,—he only had it under consideration.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD said that if a Bill such as the hon. gentleman spoke of were brought in and passed during the present crisis, every one would take advantage of it, and it would then be found that they had been too precipitate.

Mr. BROWN said his friend forgot that we had been for many years without a Bankruptcy Bill, ruining him and his other creditors. time spent in questioning and answering, discussing sponge cakes and sweetmeats, and parfait amour, a last was produced of the teas in stock, and, making allowance for the somewhat elastic quantity of a Chinese "chop," we estimated the amount at twenty-one millions of pounds, all, as we were assured, good sound teas, ready for immediate delivery. There is a still larger quantity ready to come down. The Chinese, are not likely to overestimate the extent of their stock in hand, but, upon talking this matter over with the English merchants they appear inclined to disbelieve both the amount and the quality of the stock on hand; they say that what teas the Chinese have are chiefly those of previous seasons. I am at all times unwilling to state facts which may influence present markets, for these are subjects on which I am peculiarly liable to be misinformed, and am without that knowledge of the details of Chinese commerce which would enable me to feel confidence in deciding between conflicting statements. I confine myself, therefore, to reporting the assertions on either side.

Upon the general question of trading the Chinese merchants assembled at Howqua's seemed to think that upon the authority of Peh-kwei's proclamation, they might commence their business. "More better make that trade pigeon all one fashion—that Mandarin pigeon all one fashion." The only difficulty they had was upon the subject of duties. They thought that if the allies collected duties Peh-kwei's only incentive to open the trade would be taken away, and that trade could not go on.

Lord Elgin decided this matter as they wished. It was found upon consideration that the difficulties in the way of collecting the duties ourselves were insuperable. Multitudes of internal questions would arise, and as the correspondence between Mr. Reed and Yeh had never been a great secret to anybody, it was known that a very small infraction would be eagerly laid hold of. Whenever this correspondence shall be made public you will find that it is precisely what I described it to be at the time—possibly when Lord Elgin might have been quite ignorant of its existence or purport—that the American approached the Mandarin almost with servility, offering him the protection of his ship and of that flag which, &c., and that the Mandarin met his offers with a curt snubbing and most mortifying contempt. However, the attitude of the Americans and the necessities of the Chinese government are the evident considerations which induced the allied powers to restore the trade upon its old footing, leaving all money matters to be considered hereafter an Imperial question.

France.

A letter from Marseilles states that thirty-seven individuals, arrested under the new penal law of general safety, were embarked on the preceding day on the steam-packet Cairo, to be transported to Algeria. Some of them are to be confined to Lambessa and the remainder in the province of Oran.

The Paris correspondence of the Times re-asserts that the system of espionage in France penetrates into domestic life, and that the secret police are an intolerable nuisance. The Emperor is guarded on all hands when he stirs abroad, not by cavalry and gendarmerie, but by a numerous body of men in plain clothes. If the Moniteur's statement is true, it is asked, what necessity was there for requesting the legislative corps to grant a further sum of 1,200,000f. for the secret police service, in addition to the sum of 2,000,000f. already granted for this service?

A telegraphic despatch has been sent to the maritime arrondissements and sub-arrondissements, ordering all sailors from 20 to 40 years of age, who have not completed their four years service, to join their ships immediately. The transportation of "suspects" and "expectants," arrested under the powers of the Public Safety Bill, is beginning. Two transport vessels left Marseilles for Africa last week—one with 39, and the other with 14, proscribed individuals on board. In the first batch was a Professor named Goudeneche, for whom George Sand and the Emperor's old nurse solicited pardon in vain. In consequence of the jealousy which their privileges excite in the other regiments, the corps of Cent Gardes is about to be dissolved. A new body guard will be organized, but it will consist of 400 picked men instead of 100; and the soldiers will be obliged to clean their own horses, which the Cent Gardes did not do.

The starting point for the new transatlantic line of French steamers was fixed on a spot called St. Nazaire, a little below Nantes, on the Loire, and the local custom house had already moved down, but the Nantes merchants raised such a commotion at this premature step that the removal is adjourned. Land that might have been secured at 300 francs an acre by the company had they kept their own counsel is now valued at 30,000 francs.

The late prefect of Paris police, Signor Pietri, is gone off to his native Corsica, and purposes locating himself finally in Italy, where abundant scope for professional observation is afforded just now.

It appears that the greater number of manufacturers through France are suffering at this moment, but those engaged in the sugar trade are more oppressed than any by the commercial crisis. There are now numerous petitions before the government from the merchants of Nantes, Lille, Amiens, Douai, Valenciennes, and other towns. All the refiners in these towns are in accord with the importers of colonial sugar in demanding a reduction of the present duties.

The Univers of Tuesday, the 23rd, publishes another attack on England, which fills nearly four columns. It is interspersed with the foulest provocations to national prejudice.

The Paris correspondence of the Daily News, in contradiction to the Herald's correspondent, affirms that never at any period in history were the French people less disposed to quarrel with England than now.

The Bank of Holland has reduced its rate of discount to 2½.

The cable steamer "Gorgon" will accompany the "Agamemnon" in laying the telegraph cable.

Official returns of revenue for the quarter ending March 31st show a falling off as compared with last year of £2,000,000, and those of the year show a decrease of £4,000,000 sterling.

FRANCE.

The French Minister to Switzerland has again insisted upon the Federal Government shall establish Consuls at Chiasso and Coire.

The Porte is said to have rejected the demand of France for authorization of a canal through the isthmus of Suez.

The relations of France and Switzerland continue unsatisfactory, giving rise to uneasiness.

The Paris Bourse has lost its buoyancy, and is daily declining.

LONDON MONEY MARKET.

Money continued very abundant, but the Bank of England had made no change in its rates. A dull tone had prevailed in the stock exchange. Consols closed on Thursday the 1st instant at 93¼ a 93⅜ for both money and account. Business was postponed on the 2nd, it being Good Friday, and Saturday was also to be observed generally as a holiday. The returns of the Bank of England for the week ending March 31st, show a falling off in the bullion of £101,598.

LIVERPOOL MARKETS.

April 9th, 1858.

Breadstuffs.—There has been no actual market since the departure of the "City of Washington," and Messrs. Richardson, Spence & Co. report a very limited business, and no change in quotations.

Provisions.—Beef dull and unchanged. Pork steadier, retail sales at 10s. Bacon in limited demand and rather easier. Lard in moderate request at an advance of half a cent 50s and choice 52s. Tallow flat. Sugar inactive at a decline of 6d on the week. Coffee quiet and rather easier.

London Markets.—Messrs Baring Brothers & Co. report Corn market quiet and again rather lower. White American wheat 44s to 47s; red 42s to 44s. Flour 20s to 23s. Sugar declined 6d to 1s. Tea lower. Coffee steady. Tallow quiet at 54s 3d to 55s 6d.

The Imprisonment for Debt Bill.

Mr. Attorney General Macdonald has introduced into the House of Assembly, a bill to abolish arrest in civil actions in certain cases, and for the better prevention and more effectual punishment of fraud. As might be expected the House received the bill with a variety of favor, some thinking that imprisonment should in no case be legalized except in the case of crime, while others look upon the power of the creditor over the body of his debtor as the great remedy to prevent the injustice that is often practised upon persons of his class. The relationship between debtor and creditor is so difficult a subject to legislate upon, that it is not to be wondered at if those under whose notice it is brought should take very opposite views. The antagonism which leads the creditor to persuade himself upon the smallest pretence that his charge is about to leave the country in order to defeat his claim or delay its payment, or that he has made a separation of his property from himself with that object, is as difficult to manage as the opposite feature, wherein the debtor too often converts his creditor into an enemy and an outlaw, regarding him as fair game to practice his deceits upon, and feeling an inward satisfaction that he has got the better of him, and made him suffer. Both of these sentiments must be allowed to have their place in the mind of the legislator, when he is contemplating the security of property in the one and the security of the person in the other. Mr. Macdonald's bill provides, that in order to procure the arrest before judgment of a person liable to arrest, it must be shown to the satisfaction of a judge of one of the superior courts of common law at Toronto, or a county judge by affidavit, that the cause of action amounts to twenty-five pounds, and that there is probable cause for believing that such person, unless he be forthwith apprehended, is about to quit Upper Canada with intent to defraud or delay the plaintiff. Upon the application being entertained by the judge he shall decide what amount of bail shall be taken for the appearance of the defendant. After judgment a judge's order to arrest may be obtained by the plaintiff showing, upon affidavit, to the satisfaction of a judge, that he has recovered judgment against the defendant, for the sum of twenty-five pounds, or upwards, exclusive of cost, and that there is probable cause for believing that the defendant, unless he be forthwith apprehended, is about to quit Upper Canada, with intent to defraud or delay the said plaintiff, or that he has parted with his property, or made some secret or fraudulent conveyance thereof in order to prevent its being taken in execution. Debtors confined at the time of the passing of the Act, not having suffered judgment, are entitled to a discharge, but subject to new arrest, upon a special order. A debtor in execution may claim interrogatories after ten days notice, or if he so elect, the plaintiff may have him examined viva voce, before a judge. And if the plaintiff does not meet the demand, the debtor may proceed to make oath that he is not worth five pounds, beyond his necessary wearing apparel, the bed and bedding of himself and his family, one stove and cooking utensils, and the tools and implements of his trade, not exceeding in value fifteen pounds, whereupon the judge may order the debtor's discharge; but if it shall appear that the debt for which such debtor is confined was contracted in fraud, or under false pretences, or without a reasonable assurance that he could discharge it, or that the imprisonment arises out of unpaid damages, in an action of breach of promise of marriage, seduction, crim. con., libel or slander, then the judge may order the applicant to be recommitted to close custody, for any period not exceeding twelve months, to be then discharged. Confessions of judgment voluntarily given during insolvency, or on the eve of insolvency, with intent of giving a preference over his other creditors, or to defeat his creditors, shall be invalid; but assignment made for the purpose of paying rateably and proportionably all the creditors of such debtor, will be protected. The making and taking a delivery of goods or property against the creditors is a misdemeanor, punishable in either party or both, with a fine of not more than two hundred pounds, and imprisonment of not more than twelve months.

Communications.

To the Ratepayers of the Town of Peterboro'.

Gentlemen,—

I am very reluctantly induced to address you at the present moment, and I do so because most important interests are at stake, and a feeling has been engendered of a highly injurous character by some among us, which, if it prevail, must entail a day of retribution and deep regret to a large and true-hearted class of the community, when it will be too late to remedy the error they have allowed themselves to be led into by self-interested parties.

It had been the hope of many, and especially all well-wishers of the interests of Peterboro', that our Railroad matters had reached a point when all acrimonious discussion would cease, as being useless and unprofitable, and that a strong feeling would exist to support and carry out the details of a design which had been so clearly marked out by the popular voice. A crisis, however, has arrived, appeals have been made to the public and strenuous exertions used to render inefficient all that had hitherto been effected by years of patient toil and perseverance; therefore it is that I would quietly ask the thinking people of this Town to pause and reflect, and not allow their feelings to be tampered with too much, lest they may find themselves placed in a position ruinous to the general welfare of the whole community in which they live.

A great deal has been both written and spoken on the subject of our Railroad requirements, and a vast deal of gross misrepresentation and error has gone abroad respecting what has been agreed to be done, as well as what has been proposed to be done. A short year ago all was unanimity and decision in the desire to procure a connection by rail with Port Hope, and so decided was the feeling on this head that the enterprise was actually commenced before the By-law for taking £30,000 of stock was passed by the people and the Council; towards the final close of these proceedings all opposition had ceased, and those who had acted prominently against the passage of the By-law, yielded with a good grace to public opinion, and afterwards assisted to carry out the common wish.

It is now necessary, owing to the recession again, of some of the first opponents of the Port Hope connection, to state distinctly what was proposed at that time, and what was finally put in black and white under seal.

After much discussion, and several weighty legal opinions had been given touching the powers involved, it was decided the Company had a right to lease the line of road from Peterboro' to Millbrook, and give authority to construct a branch Railroad, that lease has been entered into, and it is executed and signed, and is on record in the Registry office of this County, and a mortgage of that lease is also executed in favour of a Trustee for the Town of Peterboro, and put on record in the same office. These two documents read over several times and revised before the leading men of the Town, and the parties interested as being bound by them, contain all the particulars and conditions on which the Branch was constructed, and worked, and the manner in which the Town of Peterboro was to pay out the amount of stock authorized to be subscribed for in the books of the Company.

First as to what was to be done, the contractors were bound to make the Branch and purchase the right of way inclusive from Millbrook to Peterboro, the distance named being twelve and a-half miles, and it was to be equal in every respect to the Lindsay line then built, to be completed on the 13th day of November, 1858, and the payments were to be made as the work progressed on the certificate of an Engineer, to be given monthly, who was to be approved of by the Company and the Town of Peterboro.—When the road is opened, the Contractors are bound to provide and run one train every working day through the year,—nothing is said in the contract respecting Stations and Buildings, but as the contractors must run one train per day, as a matter of course they are obliged to provide such accommodation in that way as would be necessary to carry on the business done.

The next most important point was the rolling stock to work the Road, this also if not otherwise provided for is bound to be so by the Contractors, who, failing to run a train every day between Peterboro' and Port Hope, would not only forfeit their lease of the Branch, but also their subscription of stock for £10,000; this material item of equipment was indirectly provided for in a way that was satisfactory and certain, and was at the time fully explained, by the President of the road and others; nothing has arisen to disturb the arrangement then made, but on the contrary it had been reaffirmed both verbally and in writing, and a very considerable portion of the requisite stock has not only been purchased but is actually delivered and ready for use.

Some persons have not hesitated to assert that for the subscription of £30,000 the Railway was to be continued up to the Mills, and that rolling stock sufficient to equip the road was also to form a part of the property of the branch; now as one having a perfect knowledge of what was proposed to be done by the Contractors for the total subscription of £50,000, I can positively say that no such understanding was ever contemplated, or even alluded to as between the Contractors and the Company, nor did any acknowledged friend of the enterprise ever appear before a public meeting of the inhabitants and make use of language calculated to convey such an impression.

The friends of a connection spoke for and advocated the building of the Branch from Millbrook to Peterboro', and that the town should subscribe for that object £30,000, in which calculation they knew that rolling stock was no part of it, and that twelve miles and a-half was the extent to which the contractors were bound by their agreement. They knew likewise that it was proposed to extend the Branch to the Mills, and that it was hoped other Municipalities would join, and without which it was felt the enterprise could not prove either complete or successful.

These are the leading facts with respect to the construction of the Millbrook Branch, and the documents of record in the Registry office of the County will prove that I am substantially correct in what I have stated.

From the day that the Road was commenced until the track was laid in the beginning of Winter, a period of about five months the work was pushed with the utmost vigor and energy and at a greatly increased cost in every respect to the contractors, who were anxious to meet the public view and have the road ready for opening early in the Spring. About this time difficulties arose which prevented part of the Peterboro' subscription being made available, at a period when it was urgently required; this difficulty was got up by internal and external enemies to the connection with Port Hope, and consisted in crying down the By-law passed as illegal, and in taking every pains to circulate these opinions, with written declarations that any debentures issued and sold under the By-law would not represent any value. Owing to these discreditable movements, the By-law was brought under the action of the Queens Bench, when the Court at a certain stage of the proceedings intimated that it would be desirable to pass a new By-law for the amount required to make good the balance of the subscription of stock, or ask Parliament to legalize the old By-law to that extent.

The intimation of the Court has been complied with, and a new By-law is before the people to carry it out, in the meantime a former bitter and persistent foe to the road has taking up his old position and seeming to delight in the financial embarrassment which has taken place, with some other untoward differences which had arisen between the Contractors and the Company increasing the embarrassment—but now fortunately removed—is again busily engaged in gloating over previous predictions, decrying the road, its friends and promoters, the Company and the Contractors, and doing everything within the compass of his power, through misrepresentation, false figures, and false statements, to poison and prejudice the public mind against the new By-law and against the fulfillment of the pledged faith of the Town carefully omitting to point out to the said public the consequences that must inevitably result to the Municipality and people through a breach of their obligations legally incurred under seal.

The great source of faultfinding seems to culminate in what is declared to be a want of full and proper accounting by the Railroad Committee of the past and present year. If those accounts and statements had been sought for they might have been easily found with the Clerk of the Council, but the grumbler wanted no such dry and musty occupation to destroy his baseless fabric, and the matter of amount is after all a simple and plain affair and may be summed up, thus:—

Now what is the plain result of the short statement of facts which has been given? Can it be denied that Peterboro', after mature deliberation, considered it absolutely necessary to procure a second outlet to the front; and having come to that determination she authorized the Mayor to subscribe £30,000 to carry out the object; this has been done, and it is simply absurd to say that the agreement entered into will not have to be fulfilled. Is it not evident already that a beneficial result has been felt by the road being nearly in a condition to be opened?—and the question of the legality to build it being set at rest,—and in that not seen in the altered manner in which the business (on the Cobourg road) is being conducted? Where are the complaints now, of highhanded proceedings and exorbitant charges? All vanished, because a rival is about to occupy a portion of the same ground. But it may here be remarked that the senseless cry of opposition got up at the present moment, acts in a two-fold capacity, and has different ends in view—one set of foes desire delay only, in order that Cobourg may reap another season's business without a rival, and in the hope that in the interval something may turn up in the chapter of accidents to place the interests of that road and town in a more favorable position; the second class of opponents called into existence by the first, have totally different views, their object is to repudiate the whole transaction, defeat the By-Law and defy all consequences. It is just possible that the opposition already put forth, with the seeming indifference of a class of men whose interests would be served beyond all others by the opening of the Port Hope route, may have effected a point in these transactions: I mean the loss to the Town of the interest on £20,000 sterling Debentures already borrowed.

But should the worst class of opponents succeed in their endeavours, do they think by that means to escape from the dilemma in which they would place themselves and the Town? Not in the least; they would certainly (if they have not done so already) relieve the Contractors from the obligation of paying any interest; but the Company would call upon them, and compel payment of the Stock.

By some among us it has been argued, that if the Queen's Bench quash the By-Law for £30,000, the Town would be relieved from the responsibilities incurred under it. I dissent from this view on two grounds: first, because a large expenditure on good faith has been made through the passage of that By-Law, as well as the signature of the Mayor to the Stock Book; and secondly, the Judges are represented as having made special reference to the important interests covered by the By-Law, as a reason for not giving judgment until an opportunity had been afforded of protecting these interests in the manner pointed out.

It is beside the issue now, for those opposing parties to raise the question of bad management, want of care and proper judgment, although I deny that such has been the case, but on the contrary assert that it has been a sound and good undertaking of the kind in which Peterboro' has been engaged, though new to her and her people; and thus it is that many persons are led into making remarks and passing opinions upon matters with which it is quite impossible they can be even imperfectly acquainted.

The proper way to look at the question is the honest one. We have made a bargain, let us keep it; we have promised to pay £30,000 for obtaining a Railroad to connect at Millbrook with Port Hope—we have paid £20,000 of that sum, and it is our duty promptly to make up the difference and have the road opened, and give it our support and business. If we have had any bickerings and differences in carrying out the object in detail, let us now sink them and forget them in unanimity of purpose, and make up our minds from past experiences to do better another time.

I am quite sanguine the people of Peterboro' will never regret having assisted to build the Millbrook Branch, and the day is not far distant when all will join in acknowledging this to be correct, and also admit it as the means of having made Peterboro' a large and thriving inland Town.

I remain, Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
CIVIS.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Sir:—I am informed there is going to be a public meeting at the Town Hall, on Friday evening, respecting the £12,500 By-Law. I wish to inform you and all my friends, that I do not desire them to attend to argue my rights. I know what I have to do, and what Peterboro' has got to do. I am quite indifferent whether the By-Law passes or not.

Yours Truly,
John Fowler.

Peterboro', April 22, 1858.

The Vital Point

The vital point is about the size of the head of a pin. It is a little spot formed of the grey substance of the nerves. The vital spot is situated at the point of junction between the cerebral marrow and the spinal marrow. The physiologist Lorry is said to have been the first observer of this point, probably because he was the earliest observer who has recorded his observations in books. Sudden death from what has been popularly called breaking the neck seems, however, to have induced medical men from very remote times to suspect the existence of some such point. Rough men have often inflicted instant death upon children by lifting them up by the head. Cage birds in escaping from their cages sometimes dash their beaks against the glass of windows and kill themselves instantly by breaking their necks. The bull-finch of a friend of mine, escaping from his cage during the love season, dashed against a pane of glass and expired instantly. On examining the bird, I found it had ruptured the vital point. The guardians of lighthouses describe how, during nights of storm and hurricane, they are continually hearing sea-birds dashing themselves against the strong glass of their beacons, and then falling mysteriously down dead.

Lorry says, "This place is found in little animals between the second and third, and third and fourth vertebræ; and between the first and second vertebræ of the neck, and between the second and third in animals of greater bulk."—Legallois describes the spot exactly: "Respiration does not depend upon the whole brain, but really upon a very limited spot upon the medulla oblongata, which is situated at a small distance from the occipital hole, and towards the origin of the pneumogastric nerves, or eighth pair."—Legallois arrived at this discovery, which determines the function of the medulla oblongata, and reveals the primal motor of the mechanism of respiration, the central point of the nervous system, by cutting successive slices of the brain until the section of the origin of the eighth pair of nerves stopped the respiratory movements.

M. Flourens has added minute precision to the exactitude of the invaluable discovery of his predecessors. The vital point, he says, is situated five millemetres under the origin of the pneumogastric nerves upon the brain of a dog. The vital point is situated three millemetres under the origin of the pneumogastric nerve upon the brain of a rabbit. The bifurcation of the brain or medulla oblongata, forming a V, the vital point is located at the point of the V. It is a grey corpscup point. This grey pin's-head-like spot is the keystone of the fabric of life.—The ancients imagined the Fatal Sisters with the distaff, the spindle, and the scissors, presiding successively over the thread of life; and the moderns have revealed a junction of the nervous fibres which a small gimlet can scoop out easily, changing thereby, in an instant, life into death!

This great fact is easily demonstrated.

"I often," says M. Flourens, "make the experiments by transverse sections.

"If the section passes above the point, the respiratory movements of the chest persist.

"If the section passes behind the point of junction of the pyramids, the respiratory movements of the face, the movement of the nostrils and yawning per se.

"If the section passes upon the point of the V of the grey substance inserted upon the V of the junction of the pyramids or pen's nib, the respiratory movements of the chest are abolished instantly and altogether.

"I often perform the experiment in another way.

"I plunge a little cutting punch into the prolonged marrow, taking great care to subject the instrument to the V of the grey substance. I then suddenly isolate the vital point, and the respiratory movements of the face are suddenly abolished."

The study of the vital point clears up many dark puzzles.

I need not point out to you how it explains the cause of sudden death from what is called breaking the neck. The hangman who understands the business adjusts the knot so as to dislocate the vertebræ, and tear the vital junction loader. The knowledge of this point is very important to Coroners and their juries, and all persons having to distinguish between suicides and murders. When the rest of the pneumogastric nerves are torn, death is instantaneous; and this rupture requires marvellously little to accomplish it. Suicides are mistaken for murders by persons who do not know how easily suicides can kill themselves with their feet resting, or with their bodies lying, upon the ground. Nothing more is needful than force enough to tear the breadth of a pin's head of nervous fibre. The hangman's work is commonly spoken of as an asphyxia, which it only is when bunglingly done. I once knew a benevolent clergyman who, having been a Surgeon before he entered the Church, and knowing the secret of hanging, showed his affection for a penitent culprit condemned to death for a small offence, by attending upon him on the scaffold, and by himself adjusting the knot of the rope in the way needful to secure the instantaneous rupture of the point of life.

The functions of the vital spot, while explaining the suddenness of many deaths which are constantly deemed mysterious and suspicious, explain also the prolongation of life for considerable periods, sometimes after the most fatal and frightful wounds. What I have said about the vital point explains what used to be when I was there, and perhaps still is, one of the standing wonders of London. There used to be several eating-houses in the city famous for turtle soup; and, of course, there are plenty of them still—But at the doors of the houses which exhibited the wonder there might be seen lying upon a layer of sawdust, at the bottom of a basket, the living head and neck of a turtle, the flesh of which was said to be already made into soup, and served up to the gastronomes inside. The head was undoubtedly alive. The eyes were alive and moving. They seemed dimly, vaguely, and feebly to ask from the spectators if not an explanation of the phenomenon, at least, why and wherefore the head had been severed in this way. Persons hardly enough to put their fingers into the mouth were assured of the vivacity of the severed head by receiving a good pinch. I for one am guiltless of having ever eaten any of the soup; nevertheless I am still haunted by those reproaching eyes, although I am sure I could exclaim, "Thou can-t not say I did it."

The physiologists long since reversed the wonder of the London cooks. The cooks displayed heads alive and bodies soup, and the savans displayed heads dead and bodies alive. Redi cut off the head of a turtle which survived twenty-three days. Flourens had some salamanders which lived several months without their heads. Legallois says birds have been known to walk and run with their heads off.

The explanations are very simple. The vital point is close to the head in all reptiles, and the London cooks, when cutting off the head cut off the vital point with it. The physiologists do just the reverse. When the physiologists sever the heads of frogs, turtles, or salamanders, with a view to show the reptiles living without their head, they are careful, by cutting above the vital point, to keep it attached to the body.

One more explanation and I have done. The newspaper correspondents who wrote home accounts of the battle of the Alma, challenged physiologists to explain how a soldier, the length of whose head from the front to the back had been traversed by a bullet, was able to walk down the hill to wash his head in the river.—Similar facts have long been well known. Men have lived many years, well, sane and healthy, after their skulls have been cleft to a considerable depth on one side. The records of physiology are full of marvellous survivals after the most terrible wounds: and their number will be increased continually, as the spread of science diminishes fear and increases courage among mankind. Hope will more and more help the healing art, when it is known how nature triumphs over the most dismal disasters which leave unscathed the vital point—that all-important but well protected pin's head point, where alone the prick of a pin is death.

The subject of a Pacific Railroad has again been thrown overboard in Congress. The Senate, by a vote of 25 to 20, voted to postpone it until December next, upon the plea that they could not agree upon a route. The leading friends of the Administration were the active advocates of the postponement.

Buffalo, April 20.—Two Germans named Thuringer and Zimmerman were arrested here last week, charged with enlisting men for the British service. Their examination closed last night. They were held for trial for the infringement of the neutrality laws.

Montenegro.—A letter from Caltaro of the 17th ultimo says an ukase has been published by order of Prince Canicelo in all markets and transmitted to all Captains and centurians. It interdicts under most severe penalties, the committal of the highest act of hostility on Ottoman territory. It is also therein stated that Montenegro will not assume the offensive against Turkey but that in the event of any aggression on the part of the latter, it will oppose force to force.

The Poisoning Case.—The inquest on the body of Patrick Harrington was resumed yesterday at the Town Hall, before Coroner Balfour. Several witnesses were examined, and the evidence elicited went to substantiate that already adduced on a previous occasion. The jury returned the following verdict:—"That we are of opinion from the evidence that has been adduced, that Patrick Harrington came to his death by poison given to him by Catherine Dwyer, now in custody." The prisoner was accordingly committed for trial at the next Assizes.—Brampton Courier, 17th.

The Relief of Saugor.—The most important event of the fortnight is the relief of Saugor, on the 3rd inst., by Sir Hugh Rose, with a column of troops from Bombay. For eight months 173 men, 67 women, and 130 children, have been cooped up in a small fort intended only for the defence of the arsenal, and containing but the dwelling house and a few out offices.—During the whole time, the garrison was at the mercy of the 31st Native Infantry, and some few of the 42nd Native Infantry, who, though the entire country around them was in a state of open rebellion, remained true to their salt.—Daily News's Calcutta correspondent.

Toronto, Saturday, April 17, 1858.

Since our last report there has not been a great deal done in produce, the trade having become depressed and prices of the principal articles somewhat lower. The supplies from farmers and millers have been very small, while the demand has been less active than usual. The roads in the country will probably be broken up by the recent heavy rains, and this with the spring work on the farms which will now be commenced, will limit the deliveries for the next few weeks. The weather for the week has been unfavorable to vegetation, but if succeeded by a few warm days great good will be done.

Wheat.—The demand for wheat is less urgent, and since Friday there has been less competition than usual. The unfavorable advices from abroad, and the large amount of Western grain ready for shipment, and indeed now on the lakes, have deterred buyers from operating freely. Prices of good wheat have, however, only slightly declined, and any quantity that is likely to offer here will be bought at fair rate. The outside figure now for the best fall wheat is 91 (9s) per bushel, ranging from that down to 90c to 85c (4s 6d to 4s 9d) for medium to good samples. The purchases, with the exception of a few loads for local mills, are all for the Eastern States, for milling purposes.

The receipts for the past week are slightly over 9,000 bushels, against 7,000 bushels for the corresponding week last year. The average price for the week would be about 4s 10d, while for the corresponding week last year it was 4s 6d per bushel.

Spring Wheat.—Good samples fit for seed are in active request at 80c to 85c (3s to 3s 3d) per bushel. Medium lots being only 75c (2s 9d.)

Y'day—In store last report, bush.	122,396
Received since	8,949
	131,345
Shipped	27,150
At present in store	104,197

Flour.—Since our last report the demand for flour for export has almost entirely ceased, and the market closes in a very depressed state. Prices are unsettled, and but for the small amount offering might materially decline; so far there is only a slight movement in that direction, but quite sufficient to indicate that to name sales, much lower rates would have to be accepted. As it is, in the absence of transactions we find it difficult to fix quotations with any degree of accuracy, and accordingly give a wide range, and call rates nominal at that. Superfine, $3 90 to $4; fancy, $4 15 to $4 25; extra, $4 37½ to $4 50; double extra, $4 75 to $5 per barrel. There is no disposition to operate, buyers awaiting further advices from abroad and anxious to see the effect of arrivals of Western produce on the New York and other markets.

The following will show the receipts, shipments, and amount of flour in store on the wharves here up to Tuesday night last:—

Flour—In store last report, barrels	35,189
Received since	1,746
	36,935
Shipped	3,301
At present in store	33,634

In Montreal the receipts have been light, particularly of Superfine No. 1, which finds purchasers at $4 50. Extra and fancy are dull at $4 80 to $5 and $4 60 to $4 65, respectively. For future delivery there is less enquiry, and it is procurable at $4 50 for all May.

Barley.—The demand for barley is still active at 40c to 45c (2s to 2s 3d) for very choice samples, and 30c to 35c (1s 6d to 1s 9d) to inferior and medium per bushel.

Oats are in moderate supply at 30c to 33c (1s 6d to 1s 8d) per bushel by large lots, and 35c (1s 9d) for small parcels.

Peas of good quality still move freely at 50c to 55c (2s 6d to 2s 9d), for consum ase, per bushel.

Seed.—The demand for seeds is less active, and although we do not alter our quotations, the market is less favorable to the seller. We call Timothy at $1 50 to $1 75 per bushel of 48 lbs., and Clover at $4 75 to $5 per bushel of 60 lbs.

Hay does not come in freely, and good timothy finds sale at $15 to $18, and sometimes $20 per ton.

Potatoes are plentiful at various prices ranging from 55c to 70c (2s 9d to 3s 6d) per bushel, according to quantity and quality. The demand for seed potatoes is not very active.

Apples are plentiful at $2 25 to $2 50 per barrel and 4s to 5s per bushel.

Butter.—Good fresh butter is scarce, and enquired for at 25c (1s 3d) per lb. Tub is in fair supply, but of good quality there is still a scarcity.—We quote it at 12½c to 15c (7½ to 9d) per lb by the firkin.

Eggs are very plentiful and prices continue low, ranging from 10c to 12½c (6d to 7½d) per dozen.

Poultry comes in more freely and finds sale at 4c to 5c (2s to 2s 6d) per pair for chickens, and 15c to 70c (7s 3d to 3s 6d) for ducks. Turkeys $1 to $1 50 each. Pigeons very plentiful, and somewhat of a drug at $1 per dozen.

Beef.—The supply of cattle is about equal to the demand, and the market is quiet at $5 to $6 per 100 lbs, deducting one-third for shrinkage. There is nothing doing in slaughtered.

Pork.—There has been no transactions in fresh Pork. Cured meats are very firm at our former quotations. The stock on hand is light, though fully equal to the present or prospective demand.

Sheep are not very plentiful, and are named at $5 to $7 each. Calves are in good supply at $2 to $5 each.

Wool is in more active request at 10d per lb. Sheep skins sought after at 80c to $1 (4s to 5s) each. Beef hides $4 per 100 lbs. Calf skins 6d per lb.

Died.

At Peterborough, on the 10th instant, very suddenly, John Woods, of Smith, aged 32 years.

Deceased had come to Town on business, and while so engaged, he fell down and expired. He had been in bad health for some time. He was much respected by his acquaintances.

PLEASE READ.

THE GREAT WONDER OF THE AGE.—A NEW ERA DAWNING upon the USERS OF PEN and INK. A valuable and wonderful discovery.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK.

An entirely new article, by the discovery of which Pen and Ink are rendered useless. It can be used as a

Writing, Copying, or Indelible Ink,

For either of which it can truly be called the ne plus ultra of the kind. For

Writing

It possesses all the beauty of fluid Ink. It is jet black, and so permanent as not to be removed by the strongest oxalic acid. Hence its great value in writing deeds, wills, and other valuable papers. As it will not blot nor crack, it is highly commendable for the use of book-keepers and writers generally. For

Copying,

It works wonderfully. Three, or even four copies can be made at one writing, thus dispensing with the copying machines and the trouble attending it. By a process recently discovered, embroidery patterns, pictures, etc, can be copied accurately on cloth, wood, steel, or any hard substance. For

Printing,

Postmasters and users of stamping apparatus generally value it highly. It matters not how careless the operation, a legible impression is invariably made. Its permanency makes it particularly valuable for stamping clothes.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK

Is put up in packages arranged especially for the travelling community. It can be carried in the pocket, and used at any time. There is no pen required for using it, but it contains in itself everything requisite for persons desiring to correspond with their friends. Every one will find this as represented. As many may be inclined to class the "Portable" as one of the many humbugs of the day, we agree to send a sample package to any one for twenty-five cents, or the same amount in postage stamps. Do you wish for Honourable, Genteel, and Lucrative Employment?

We wish to engage agents for the sale of this celebrated Ink, and can assure all that they will find no better employment or more money-making business than this, and hoping that you will carefully consider it, we await your orders.

TERMS.

To local or travelling agents, we offer the following inducements: For Two Dollars we will send any one two packages of the Ink by mail, and prepay postage on the same; and also we will send full and explicit directions for making, putting up and selling the article.

Any one can make and sell enough to remunerate him for his outlay in a single day.

Pay of the Business.

It is unnecessary to say anything of the money that can be made in this business. It is entirely new and in great demand. Any person can make and put up a thousand packages a day, which will cost three dollars, and which retail at twenty-five cents each, making a profit of two hundred and forty-seven dollars.

☞ No agent will be confined to a single county, but may sell wherever he chooses. You can realize from three to five dollars per day. We wish it understood, that no deviation from the above will be made. Orders solicited.—Address,

ARTIFICIAL STONE.
Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. ITS BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. ITS DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. ITS CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

N. B.—WANTED—Agents for Sale of Licences or to make and vend in each county.

PLASTER. PLASTER.
VIENNA PLASTER!

THE undersigned begs leave to inform the Farmers of Canada, and all concerned in the use of Land Plaster, that he is now prepared to supply all who may favor him with their patronage with the above named article.

The following analysis of this Plaster prepared by the most eminent chemist in the city of New York is proof of the superior qualities of this Plaster over any other in the State of New York:

"This certifies that I have analysed a specimen of Vienna Plaster, and also a specimen of Cayuga or Onondaga Plaster, and find them to yield respectively as follows:—

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Hon. Mr. MORRIS, from the committee on the Bill to secure to married women certain separate rights of property, reported the Bill as amended.

The amendments were adopted, and the Bill ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

CAPT. KENNEDY.

Hon. Col. PRINCE moved that the petition of Capt. William Kennedy, praying for compensation for losses sustained in consequence of the sale by the Government of lands belonging to him and situated at Southampton, during his absence upon an expedition in search of Sir John Franklin, be referred to a Select Committee.—Carried.

THE REBELLION OF 1837-8.

Hon. Col. PRINCE also moved that the petition of John Montgomery, praying for indemnity for the burning of his property on Yonge street, during the rebellion of 1838, be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Hons. Messrs. Ferguson, Moore, Hartmanus Smith, Masson, Simpson, Widmer, and the mover.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET hoped his hon. friend would not press his motion. The petition of Mr. Montgomery had been on three several occasions brought before the other branch of the Legislature, and it had been as often rejected. He did not think this was a petition to be referred to a Committee, and if his hon. friend would only look at the statute 8 Vic. cap. 106, he would see that Mr. Montgomery was not in a position to claim the sympathy of the House. That act was passed on the 20th December, 1844, and contained a preamble that set forth that the petitioner had been lawfully convicted and attainted of high treason; that the Royal pardon had been mercifully extended to him; that at the time of his conviction and attainder he was seized and possessed of divers estates of freehold and inheritance, and of other estates of and in certain lands and hereditaments in Upper Canada; that by his conviction and attainder the said estates had become vested in Her Majesty; and that the Queen had been pleased to grant restitution of the said estates, lands, and tenements, subject to the debt and liabilities which existed or were attached to the same at the time of such conviction and attainder.—Now (continued Mr. Vankoughnet) the hon. gentleman would see that at the time of the passing of this act John Montgomery had no claim upon the Legislature—his sole appeal was made upon the mercy of the Crown; and the giving up to him such property as was still in existence, subject to the payment of debt, was a pure act of grace. And yet after property which had become part of the public domain had been given up to John Montgomery to enable him to pay his debts, he, the man who had been convicted of high treason, came before the House and asked to be compensated out of the public chest for the losses which his treasonable practices had occasioned him. He hoped the House would unhesitatingly reject the proposal for sending the petition to a Committee, seeing that the House of Assembly had hitherto refused to petition the Governor General to recommend that the petitioner should receive relief out of the public revenue.

Hon. Mr. DEBLAQUIERE hoped his hon. friend would withdraw the motion, as he considered that the House would be paying but a poor tribute of respect to Her Majesty were they to entertain the petition, and he thought that the President of the Council had unanswerably shown that it was not consistent with their dignity as advisers of the Crown to receive such petition.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON said he felt himself placed in a peculiar position. Colonel Prince asked him that morning to consent to his being added to the committee, and he then told Col. Prince that he was afraid he had suffered his good feelings to obtain the better of his judgment. He begged that his name might be taken off the committee.

Hon. Mr. MOORE said that since the Rebellion Losses Commission had finished their labors and reported, there had been many applications for aid from parties whose claims the Commission had rejected, and he thought it wrong at this time, when bygones should be treated as bygones, a discussion upon the events of 1837-8, should in any way be revived. He wished to withdraw his name from the committee.

Hon. Col. PRINCE said he did not at all think that he ought to withdraw this motion. Granted, that this petition had been two or three times before the House of Assembly, this was the first occasion of its being introduced into the Legislative Council, from whom the public had a right to expect justice and honesty. Were the members of this House about to say that a man had no right to further petition Parliament merely because a subordinate branch of the Legislature had thought proper, in his opinion upon unjust grounds, to reject it? Would they consent to play second fiddle to the House of Assembly? Would they submit to be bound by the Lower House, when an injured man called upon them for justice? Were they to be bound by the lower branch of the Legislature?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—I think we should call the hon. member to order.

Hon. Col. PRINCE—What is the point of order?

Hon. Mr. ROSS said the House of Assembly almost half pastor to originate money votes, and he did not think the hon. member was in order in casting reflections upon that body because they had refused the petition.

Hon. Col. PRINCE said, until he was called to order by the Speaker, he considered he was entitled to the freedom of the House to say whatever he considered necessary in support of his motion. He had not said one word against the House of Assembly, he merely stated that they had thrown out the petition, and he thought they had no right to do so. [Laughter.] He thought the House of Assembly had acted unconstitutionally in refusing the petition, and he thought the petitioner had the strongest claim upon them.

Hon. Mr. ROSS regretted that after an interval of more than twenty years a debate should have taken place in this House which involved a reference to the events of 1837, and he thought it most unwise that at this distance of time the trial of the respective parties who were implicated in the rebellion should be commenced anew. Only a short time since he (Mr. Ross) saw rebel army commissions bearing the signature of the petitioner.

Hon. Col. PRINCE called the hon. gentleman to order. It was not fair for his hon friend to refer to commissions said to have been signed by Mr. Montgomery, when he objected to a committee being appointed to enquire into these allegations. He (Col. Prince) asserted that Mr. Montgomery did not sign these commissions.

Hon. Mr. ROSS asserted that he did, and he was sure a majority of the House would reject the motion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON said if these cases were entertained there would be no end to them. Within the present week he had received a request from a person to present a petition claiming £500 for losses said to have been incurred during the Lower Canadian revolt.

Hon. Mr. PATTON said he had been requested to present a petition from one who had suffered grievous losses; but he had been advised that the sufferer ought to have urged his claim before the Commissioners, and that having neglected to do so, he could not now seek redress. Here, however, was a man figuring upon the statute books as having been convicted of treason, and who was a recipient of the favors of the Crown, requesting that indemnity which could not now be extended to those who had been loyal to their Queen and true to their country. Were they to be told that the jury who convicted Mr. Montgomery were actuated by strong partizan feelings? Language of that sort was an insult to the House, casting as it did a reflection upon the mode of administering justice in this country, and it ought not to be permitted. His hon. friend had asked where was the difference between the offence of this man and that of others now high in office; but he (Mr. Patton) cared nothing about the offences of others—Mr. Montgomery had been convicted as a felon, and it was an insult to the Legislature for him to demand compensation for what he had suffered.

Hon. Col. PRINCE replied, and implored the House to pause before they rejected the resolution.

The motion was then put and lost—three voting for and twenty-three against it. Those who supported the motion were Hons. Colonel Prince, and Messrs. Dessaulles and Morris.

Will there be War in Utah?

As we intimated last week, the President has appointed civil Commissioners to accompany the Utah army—Governor Powell and Major M'Cullough. These gentlemen are instructed to endeavor to bring Brigham Young to reason before forcible measures are taken; and it is stated to be the opinion of Mr. Bernhisel, the Mormon delegate to Congress, that, had they been sent twelve months ago, the expense and trouble of the Utah expedition might have been spared.

At the time our latest advices left Utah Territory, the middle of February, Brigham Young had notified General Johnston that he and his force must vacate their quarters and betake themselves homeward to the States by the 10th of March. It may be that this notice was merely intended as a bravado. The Mormons are adepts at the art of brag. But if the menace was intended seriously—if it be the design of the Mormons really to insist on the withdrawal of the United States troops from the Territory, we know enough of General Johnson's character and intentions to feel certain that a terrible conflict must already have taken place, and that either our little army has been severely cut up, or that it has cut its way into Salt Lake City. In either event it strikes us that the attitude of the Peace Commissioners, on arriving at the scene of action, will be somewhat ridiculous.

We expressed, last week, our views of the policy of dispatching civil Commissioners in the train of army to act as advisers and school-masters to the general commanding. However, as the new commander of the Utah army, General Smith, seems to have made no protest against the appointment of Powell and M'Cullough, we presume he does not anticipate that any inconvenience will arise from it. It is his affair.

But, at any rate, the Administration seems to be in a pretty dilemma. If the Peace Commissioners settle the business without fighting, how will the President reconcile it on his consciences to have spent such an enormous sum on an unnecessary military expedition—the mere loss in cattle amounting to many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and every barrel of flour eaten by the army having cost the Government, it is said, one hundred dollars? And if the Mormons fight, how will Mr. Buchanan explain his only sending Peace Commissioners to the scene of action when the battle has been fought?—Harper's Weekly.

Hints to Sensible People.

Very few persons, outside of the foreign trading community, comprehend the whole importance of the statement which has been stereotyped in the papers latterly—that exchange on London has ranged from 107 to 108. It is, however, a fact of the highest moment to the entire community. Let us explain it in a sentence. The par of exchange between the United States and Great Britain is 109; that is to say, when bills on England can be bought here at 109, there is no current of money flowing either way. When we are debtors of England we generally, now, find ourselves buying bills for London, Glasgow, Manchester, Hull, and almost all our foreign correspondents, on London at rates above par, at some rate, between 109 and 110, or 111. When, on the contrary, we are not debtors but creditors of the foreign world, exchange on London falls below par, that is to say, below 109. The meaning, therefore, of the decline in foreign exchange is, that we are liquidating our foreign debt, and piling up abroad a balance in our favor.

This anomalous fact is partially explained by the Custom-house returns at this port, which, as every one knows, is the largest importing port in the United States. During the three months ending on March the 31st, our importation of foreign goods fell short of those of the corresponding months of last year by thirty-six millions of dollars. Our importation for the nine months which have elapsed of the current fiscal year—notwithstanding that they include three months of enormous speculation, importation and general commercial activity last fall—fall short of those of the corresponding period of the former fiscal year by nearly thirty millions of dollars. In other words, assuming the operations of the past three months as the basis of calculation, the people of the United States are at present retrenching their consumption of foreign merchandise and manufactures to two-thirds of what they were before the late panic. The consequence of this we see in the fall of foreign exchange.

We are, in fact, at the present moment becoming creditors of the world at large. Whether we shall remain so depends upon the conduct of our people. Last fiscal year we sold to foreign countries, in round figures, three hundred and sixty-two millions of our produce, and took from them in exchange three hundred and sixty millions of produce and manufactures. If we had dispensed with one-third of these latter—as we are now doing—there would have been a balance not of two, but of one hundred and twenty-two millions of dollars in our favor, which we could have drawn at pleasure in specie.

It rests with the people of the United States to decide whether they will, or will not, become the bankers of the world. If they resolutely determine to curtail their consumption of foreign luxuries—to buy as few silks, laces, watches, jewelry, wines, foreign hardware, cottons, woolens, and linens, tea, coffee, sugar, and fruits, as absolute necessity requires—in a very few years New York will occupy the place now filled by London in the commercial community, and this will be the general bank of the trading world. Foreigners can not dispense with our cotton, corn, wool, and tobacco; we can do without a great portion of their manufactures. It only needs a little resolute economy on the part of our rich people. If every father of a family would make a rule to use no foreign luxuries of any kind, the battle would be won. If every lady would agree to dispense with foreign silks and laces for two or three years, half the work would be accomplished. If wine-drinkers would agree to do without Champagne and claret till 1862, there would be no need of self-denial after that date.

The solution of the problem rests with the consumers—that is to say, the great public of the United States. So long as they will buy, merchants will import. So long as they do import on the scale of recent years, we shall, as a nation, accumulate nothing. It is simply a question of a few years' abstinence from unnecessary luxuries.

The question has been confused by foolish endeavors of the manufacturers to involve it in the protectionist dispute. People who would gladly exclude foreigners from our markets have been led to support them by the selfish efforts of certain classes here to obtain a legislative monopoly of those markets. In reality, there is no need of any laws on the subject. If people are resolved to spend their money on foreign luxuries, all the laws in the world will not prevent them, and the balance of trade will remain against us; if, on the contrary, the American people at large realize the importance of becoming creditors, instead of debtors, of the foreign world, they will, without any laws, cease to consume more than is absolutely necessary of foreign merchandise, and the United States will rapidly become the mart, centre, and focus of the commercial world.—Harper's Weekly.

Our Foreign Ministers.

It was well understood, when Mr. Buchanan was inaugurated, that notwithstanding the identity of political principle between him and his predecessor, the foreign representatives of the United States would all give place to new men. It was considered convenient that, in order to reward his supporters, the President should have the patronage of the foreign appointments, just as completely as if he had succeeded a chief magistrate of a hostile party. There was a reason for this independent of the exigencies of party. It was notorious that Mr. Pierce's diplomatic service had been miserably inefficient. With the exception of Mr. Buchanan himself, none of Mr. Pierce's appointees seemed to have done any thing at all. Their performance had been confined to drawing their salary, and occasionally dining and wining Americans of adequate calibre. They had achieved no purpose whatever, so far as the national interests were concerned. It was therefore very justly argued that the nation would bear up bravely against their dismissal, and the appointment of new men at their stead.

Hitherto Mr. Buchanan seems to have been in no hurry to fill the diplomatic vacancies which the rule of rotation had open to him. He has sent a new min to Prussia, another to Sweden, another to the Hague, several to South and Central America, and one or two others to other second rate courts. But the most important missions are still filled by the appointees of Mr. Pierce. Mr. Dallas still represents the country in England, and Mr. Mason continues to entertain with lavish hospitality in Paris.

So far as England is concerned, it seems likely that the important negotiations still pending between the United States and that kingdom are left to the sagacity of Washington Irving. Mr. Buchanan's selection of this poet for so delicate a mission is very creditable to him. But the case of Irving illustrates with special force Mr. Ac-

Usury Laws.

The last great financial panic, if it has exercised no other moral, has at least illustrated the folly of all usury laws. A legal standard for money was first originated by England, when wishing to borrow for herself, she made it penal to charge above a certain sum for its hire. In this country each State has its legal rate of interest, ranging from six per cent. to ten; this legal rate, as a general thing, being a dead letter in all business transaction, only coming into positive play in the loaning of money upon bond and mortgage, or in some investment of solidity; and frequently in these cases evaded by a system of bonus by which the lender gets a much larger price.

Money is as much a commodity of commerce as flour, beef or wool; its price will be governed by its scarcity in the market, and the demand. In the late panic there was not actually a less quantity of money in the country than before; the simple trouble proceeded from the fact that those who dealt in it and had large stocks in hand would not sell. The principle was carried out as in the cotton and grain trade. They would not sell because they feared the solvency of their customers. All wanted money, their debts must be paid; those who wanted were willing to pay according to its scarcity, and its market value therefore went up 24, 36, 48 per cent per annum, or any other price in accordance with the risk of the seller. Soon came the reaction.—Most commercial houses could not live at such rates; they preferred, wisely, to suspend. Those who had small amounts to pay, paid, and the demand for money ceased.—As soon as the demand ceased, then came the seller into market with his accumulated stock, but could not afford to sell it when it did not pay. A market must be found.—Money went down, down, until it became a drug at legal interest. There was no business doing to use it, consequently no buyers. The holders were looking in every direction for places to put their repleted purses. Railway shares, bank stock, that a few weeks before was spurned, now loomed up, paying dividends from 7 to 12 per cent. when money was down to 5 in the street. What wonder that the holders sought investment. Up went the stock; Third street, Wall street and State street went mad. It was the Utopia of brokers. Uncle Sam advertises for bids for his Treasury notes, and received offers as low as three per cent. The market is glutted with money. There is no outlet for it in trade, and if it were, the holder, having before his eyes that vague, indistinct shadow, the usury laws, cannot use. He cannot, because he is unwilling to take the risks of trade at the same price as he can get for it on bond and mortgage or on stocks. He is denied the privilege accorded to any other dealer, to charge for his merchandise in accordance with the risk he runs in obtaining payment.

In England, the Bank governs the rate of interest; as speculation rises or panic fills the commercial world, the Bank goes up to check the demand; during the height of the late panic the rate was up to 10, it is now down to 4. It is not uncommon to see money in London at 2, 2½ and 3 per cent., and that while the bank rates are almost double.

Our banking system is, when the demand becomes greatest, to make the discounts smaller. It was this false system that caused the late revulsion, and all its attendant consequences.

As well might we legislate to control any other branch of business as the trade in money. All usury laws simply hamper commerce, palsy the young dealer, and choke the active channels of trade. It is not the old standard houses that are affected by the price of money, they are the ones who would uphold the system. As long as it lasts, so long can they have their neighbor's note, through the "middle of a dollar," at 2 or 3 per cent a month. It is the shaky dealer, who is dependent on a large number of scattered customers through the country; if anything goes wrong with crops or exchanges, he has no funds to fall back on; there is nothing but sharpening among the brokers, and his note goes to the second man at a heavy shave, who knows, perhaps, while taking it, that the amount is intended to pay one he has already in bank against the borrower. Wherever the restrictions on the legal value of money, and all their evil system fails to the ground.—Leslie's Illus. Newspaper.

Manly Exercise.

Our young men pay too little attention to their physical training. After the usual daily business, which is chiefly of a sedentary character, they resort to the billiard saloons or theatres or drinking houses for recreation, where they pass their evenings in a manner unprofitable both in a pecuniary and healthful point of view. Instead of wasting their health and time in these close and heated saloons, how much better would it be to devote an hour or two each evening to exercises in the gymnasium, in the natural developement of their muscles and the strengthening of their physical powers. The benefit to be derived from a proper course of physical training is incalculable; it will not be found only in improved health, in vigorous elasticity, in capability to do and to endure, but it will be seen in the increased activity of the mind, in the manly tone of sentiment, in the buoyant spirits and the consciousness of vital existence. Our immediate attention was called to the consideration of this subject by a visit we paid to Ottington's Gymnasium last week. The occasion was an exhibition of his pupils, when we saw feats of strength and agility which would have taxed severely many of our public acrobats.—Contrast these young and vigorous athletes with the puny, wretched specimens of men that every hour cross our path, and the virtue of gymnasium exercises will at once be apparent. We do not think that parents pay sufficient attention to the physical training of their children. They fancy that if they take care of their heads they do all that is necessary, or should be expected from them. They, in fact, expend their brains on the hot-house principle, and leave their forms to be dwarfed for the want of healthy and energetic exercise. This reproach is applicable not only to the education of boys, but becomes even a graver reproach when considered in connection with the education of girls. Boys will run riot and get exercise somehow or the other, but our girls, bound up by the social restrictions which clog their every action, grow up as beautiful but fragile weeds, utterly unfitted physically for the duties of wife and mother. Artificiality is the end and aim of modern education, and Nature, with all its free and beautiful instincts, is sedulously kept out of view, or revealed only to be ashamed for avoidance. All this is wrong, but it is not beyond the power of remedy. The evil has been growing upon us under the guise of fashion, which only recognizes ladies and gentlemen, ignoring men and women. The effete race which has sprung up under this baneful influence will die out, and the public sentiment will demand the physical as well as the mental training, that the descendants of the men and women of the Revolution, the heirs of giants, shall not become dwarfed to pigmies.—Leslie's Ill. Newspaper.

HALIFAX, April 23.

The Canada, Capt. Lang, from Liverpool, Saturday, 10th inst., arrived at this port shortly before noon to-day. Her advices are three days later than those by the City of Washington, at New York.

The steamship North American, from Portland, arrived on the 8th inst.

The general news brought by this arrival is not of much importance, excepting what is contained in the advices from India.

The dates from Bombay are to the 18th of March. Previous to that date the British troops had made their grand attack upon Lucknow, and the city had fallen.—The rebels fled from their strongholds in the greatest disorder and confusion, and were hotly pursued by the British cavalry and artillery. There was not much hard fighting at the capture, and the losses were light, the rebels making but a feeble resistance. At the last advices, the whole city was in possession of the British.

There had been quite a panic in Calcutta in consequence of a wide spread fear of an outbreak among the natives, but it turned out to have been unfounded.

There is nothing later from China.

COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Liverpool cotton market opened for the week at a considerable advance in prices on all grades; but consequently there was a partial falling off, and the market closed quiet, at an advance of about ⅛ to ¼ of the rates as per advices by the Africa. The sales for the week amount to about 77,000 bales.

The Liverpool breadstuff market was generally quiet. Provisions, also, were without any movement of importance.

Consols had declined, and closed for money at 96⅛ to 96¼.

LIFE'S DARK SIDE.—There are in New York city nearly 40,000 women who sew for a living. About 12,000 of these are shirtmakers, 11,000 tailoresses and vestmakers, 4,400 cloak and mantilla makers, 3,000 dressmakers and milliners, besides those employed in other branches of needlework. Most of these women have been out of employment during the past winter; only about 3,000 of them, it is said, have had work to do during that period. Shirtmakers generally receive twenty-five cents a day. The introduction of sewing machines has thrown a great many out of employment.

OPEN JEWISH FARMER IN AMERICA.—It is a singular fact, revealed in the last census of the United States, that while there are, some hundred thousand Jews in that country, only one person who has ever registered as a farmer. So literally is the prophecy of their dispersion fulfilled, that they are strangers to that occupancy which labors all others, pushes a roving chase and a home. "Hey, boys, will you come and live with me? I have a farm among the vines." The Jews are traders, and attached to the soil where they are found, but only as we lodged in a foreign country. In California they follow the occupation of Jacob of the tribes they are found in large numbers. They utterly ignore that the "curse" of labor was pronounced on Adam alone. There never lived a Jew who was employed in picking huckleberries, sleep, he says, was so occupied.

REVOLUTION IN VENEZUELA.—On the 15th of March a revolution, under the lead of General Castro, broke out and overthrew the President, Monagas, who, with his wife and family, took refuge in the house of the French Minister. Perhaps there never was a more corrupt family than that of Monagas's. There is something quite ludicrous in the magnificence of Madame Monagas's peculations; she very coolly seized the custom-house of Laguayra, and constituted its revenues as her pin-money. Its receipts were about 700,000 dollars per annum.—Castro has been chosen President pro tem. that is, till the Convention meet. The popular opinion is that General Paez will be invited to return.

ANECDOTE OF HAVELOCK.—During the stay in England of General Havelock, the narrator went one evening to his house, in compliance with an invitation. In the course of conversation, Mrs. Havelock turned suddenly round to her husband and said, "By the way, my dear, where is Harry?" referring to her son, whom she had not seen during the whole afternoon.—The Colonel started to his feet: "Well, poor fellow, he's standing on London bridge, and in this cold, too. I told him to wait for me there at twelve o'clock to-day; and in the pressure of business at ——, I forgot the appointment." The father and son were to have met at twelve o'clock at noon, and it was now after seven o'clock in the evening; yet the father seemed to have no doubt that Harry would not move from his post. The Colonel at once rose, ordered a cab to be called, and, as he went forth to deliver his son of his weary watch on London Bridge, he turned round to excuse himself to his visitor, saying, "You see, sir, that's the discipline of a soldier's family." In the course of an hour the Col. returned with poor Harry, who, although he appeared to be somewhat affected by the cold watch, and glad to see the fire in the comfortable parlor at home, seemed to have passed through the little afternoon's experience with the greatest good humor, and the feeling that all was right.

The War in China.

From the Correspondents of the Illustrated London News.

CANTON, Jan. 28, 1858.

On the 17th I left Canton and steamed down the river in the Forester gun-boat, to spend a day or two at Hong-Kong. Fourteen days, or rather nights, on hard planks, with sleep constantly disturbed by real or imaginary alarms, required a little rest in all conscience. How splendid Hong Kong appeared after the one-storied and narrow-lined Canton! Queen's-road indeed looked as if it deserved the name, and the merchants' houses here bore some resemblance to palaces. The very Chinese houses, whilst preserving their own style, have grown considerably in altitude, and would rather astonish their brick and mortar brothers up Canton side. Seen from a trifling distance, with the background composed of Magazine Hill, the remains of Gough Fort, and the white-clad mountain, it presents many beautiful points of view, interspersed as it is with trees, green always, and gardens full of vegetables. The views from the walls are likewise extremely beautiful; the intense green of the paddy-fields contrasting with the reddish-brown mountains to the north-east of the city; but it is from the back of Magazine Hill (head-quarters) that the finest panorama as to be seen.—Innumerable miles of flats, paddy-fields, cultivated with Chinese perfection, spread out as far as the eye can reach, till they are lost among the hills in the hazy distance. A river intersects them, on which junks are visible; on the east a wild ravine separates you from Gough's Hill. If you look down you'll see great holes made by the shells from the fleet. Gough's Hill is so covered with graves that it looks as though 10,000 moles had for centuries been at work upon it. Between Magazine Hill and the head-quarters (within the walls) is the five storied Pagoda—an edifice with real and five spurious roofs, twisted up at the corners, like a swell's moustache; whilst below two fearless-looking lions guard the entrance. At the upper stories red coats are visible, and the British tongue is audible; below are a number of individuals in blue, from whom now and then issue such words as "Coo mow d'wan piguff" "Sharo dam," &c., leaving no doubt in the questioner as to their nationality. On the north-west the city walls extend a little way, giving you a glimpse of grey-tiled roofs, all of the same shape and size, with here and there great banyan trees, with massive foliage, small towers, and stone crenelated flanks. Turn your back now on Magazine Hill and look down before you at your feet lies the far-famed Canton. What impression does it produce upon you? Every street seems but a repetition of the former streets. You see one more square front, and the eternal grey roof. As for pedestrians, they mightily above the rest, otherwise the height of all is much the same. The city dignitaries are above all, riding here in chairs of state at the end of the city. The mass of the ships above you where the river is widening into totness. To the left you discover the Western suburbs—flanked you a prospect of hills; and to the right inland city along the walls on your left Europeans, sailors, and soldiers, are constantly coming and going. Such in brief is an outline of Canton.

Great anxiety is felt on the part of the merchants to have the blockade raised; but I suspect the authorities here gave satisfactory reasons for not desiring to put the people of the city in a state of excitement at present. RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Hon. Mr. MORRIS, from the committee on the Bill to secure to married women certain separate rights of property, reported the Bill as amended.

The amendments were adopted, and the Bill ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

CAPT. KENNEDY.

Hon. Col. PRINCE moved that the petition of Capt. William Kennedy, praying for compensation for losses sustained in consequence of the sale by the Government of lands belonging to him and situated at Southampton, during his absence upon an expedition in search of Sir John Franklin, be referred to a Select Committee.—Carried.

THE REBELLION OF 1837-8.

Hon. Col. PRINCE also moved that the petition of John Montgomery, praying for indemnity for the burning of his property on Yonge street, during the rebellion of 1838, be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Hons. Messrs. Ferguson, Moore, Harmanus Smith, Masson, Simpson, Widmer, and the mover.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET hoped his hon. friend would not press his motion. The petition of Mr. Montgomery had been on three several occasions brought before the other branch of the Legislature, and it had been as often rejected. He did not think this was a petition to be referred to a Committee, and if his hon. friend would only look at the statute 8 Vic. cap. 106, he would see that Mr. Montgomery was not in a position to claim the sympathy of the House. That act was passed on the 20th December, 1844, and contained a preamble that set forth that the petitioner had been lawfully convicted and attainted of high treason; that the Royal pardon had been mercifully extended to him; that at the time of his conviction and attainder he was seized and possessed of divers estates of freehold and inheritance, and of other estates of and in certain lands and hereditaments in Upper Canada; that by his conviction and attainder the said estates had become vested in Her Majesty; and that the Queen had been pleased to grant restitution of the said estates, lands, and tenements, subject to the debt and liabilities which existed or were attached to the same at the time of such conviction and attainder.—Now (continued Mr. Vankoughnet) the hon. gentleman would see that at the time of the passing of this act John Montgomery had no claim upon the Legislature—his sole appeal was made upon the mercy of the Crown; and the giving up to him such property as was still in existence, subject to the payment of debt, was a pure act of grace. And yet after property which had become part of the public domain had been given up to John Montgomery to enable him to pay his debts, he, the man who had been convicted of high treason, came before the House and asked to be compensated out of the public chest for the losses which his treasonable practices had occasioned him. He hoped the House would unhesitatingly reject the proposal for sending the petition to a Committee, seeing that the House of Assembly had hitherto refused to petition the Governor General to recommend that the petitioner should receive relief out of the public revenue.

Hon. Mr. DEBLAQUIERE hoped his hon. friend would withdraw the motion, as he considered that the House would be paying but a poor tribute of respect to Her Majesty were they to entertain the petition, and he thought that the President of the Council had unanswerably shown that it was not consistent with their dignity as advisers of the Crown to receive such petition.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said he felt himself placed in a peculiar position. Colonel Prince asked him that morning to consent to his being added to the committee, and he then told Col. Prince that he was afraid he had suffered his good feelings to obtain the better of his judgment. He begged that his name might be taken off the committee.

Hon. Mr. MOORE said that since the Rebellion Losses Commission had finished their labors and reported, their had been many applications for aid from parties whose claims the Commission had rejected, and he thought it wrong at this time, when bygones should be treated as bygones, a discussion upon the events of 1837-8, should in any way be revived. He wished to withdraw his name from the committee.

Hon. Col. PRINCE said he did not at all think that he ought to withdraw this motion. Granted, that this petition had been two or three times before the House of Assembly, this was the first occasion of its being introduced into the Legislative Council, from whom the public had a right to expect justice and honesty. Were the members of this House about to say that a man had no right to further petition Parliament merely because a subordinate branch of the Legislature had thought proper, in his opinion upon unjust grounds, to reject it? Would they consent to play second fiddle to the House of Assembly? Would they submit to be bound by the Lower House, when an unheard man called upon them for justice? Were they to be bound by the lower branch of the Legislature?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—I think we should call the hon. member to order.

Hon. Col. PRINCE—What is the point of order?

Hon. Mr. ROSS said the Mover of Assembly which had power to originate money votes, and he did not think that he was in order in reading the Lower House down when they had refused him relief.

Hon. Col. PRINCE said, could he not speak to order by the Speaker, as he should not attempt on the division of the House to refer to the constitutional position of the Lower House. He had not published to the world that the Lower House was already divided, but he would say that their votes, in the instance of the petitioner, were [illegible]

President of the Council, by stating what had been done by the Lower House, and surely he (Col. Prince) had a right to advance reasons why this House should not be governed by the decisions of that House?

Hon. Mr. ROSS repeated that in this matter the House were distinctly bound by the other House.

Hon. Col. PRINCE would have sat in Parliament for eighteen years to little purpose were he now to move that this House should vote the money. The object of this resolution was that a Select Committee might be appointed to address the Governor General upon the merits of Mr. Montgomery's case. The President of the Council rose in his place and said, "Behold an Act of Parliament!" But the hon. gentleman displayed the astuteness which many years' practice at the bar had given him, by altogether withholding the fact that that Act applied exclusively to Mr. Montgomery's real property; and had he taken the trouble to read the petition, he would have seen that Mr. Montgomery had lost personal property to the value of hundreds of pounds, and to which no reference was made in the act of amnesty.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET—That does not destroy my position.

Hon. Col. PRINCE—But it supplied a reason why Mr. Montgomery should ask for an indemnity. Mr. Montgomery's house was taken possession of, against his will, by seditious parties. He was convicted of treason, and so had others, high in power, been convicted. He told them in his petition that the circumstances under which he was convicted would not have secured a conviction at the present day. But, admitting everything urged against him to have been true, what was there in Mr. Montgomery's case which did not entitle him to the same relief which others equally guilty—if he was guilty—had received at the hands of the Government? Why should his case be the exception to the rule? Wherein did it differ from that of others, who were now high—very, very, very high in power? They had seen men who had been guilty of treason made baronets, and others set to rule over the people. Then, why should Mr. Montgomery's petition be rejected? It was now many years since the events to which the petition referred transpired, but he (Col. Prince) felt abashed that he took the trouble which he did on that occasion to defend his country. It was the most unfortunate period of his life; and had he done what those now in power had done, he would not now have been plain John Prince of a Western county. But he did his best to protect the dominions of his Queen, and had brought upon himself hatred, and malice, and uncharitableness, in consequence of his loyalty. However, to return to Mr. Montgomery—Was the House afraid of an investigation? Why not allow a committee to determine whether or not a wrong had been done Mr. Montgomery by his being stigmatised as a traitor? He was only a boarder in the house when the mutineers entered and took possession, contrary to his desire and that of Mr. Linfoot, his tenant; but the house was destroyed by order of the Lieutenant Governor; and now when he prayed for indemnity, his petition was rejected. He asked the House to throw aside all vague notions about treason; because treason was nowhere in this country, and those who were accused of having been guilty of it were looked upon as fine gentlemen, and had, some of them, become rulers of the land. Did not the act of amnesty equally apply to all parties? Dr. Wolfred Nelson committed an unwise act against the Government but he had been rewarded. (No.) He was in the same position as Mr. Montgomery. (No, no.) Was he never tried?

Hon. Mr. MOORE—No. He was made a prisoner, and, with others, incarcerated in the Montreal gaol; but they accepted the offer made them of absenting themselves from the country and went to Bermuda the Governor of which refusing to recognise them as convicts, they returned to New York, where they remained until the passing of the Act of amnesty.

Hon. Col. PRINCE—According to legal parlance he pleaded guilty, and was therefore in a worse position than the petitioner, who strenuously denied his guilt, and prayed that a committee might be appointed to inquire into the truth of his allegations. Could they refuse the prayer of this petition?

Hon. Mr. MOORE said that if a committee were appointed and reported favorably on Mr. Montgomery's claims, the House could not give the indemnity asked for, and they would be only stultifying themselves by receiving the petition.

Hon. Col. PRINCE was a young member of this House, and was very sorry indeed to be called upon to instruct the hon. gentleman upon his duties as a legislator. The hon. gentleman did not appear to think that the House had power to address his Excellency upon anything.

Hon. Mr. MOORE—Address His Excellency in the face of that statute!

Hon. Col. PRINCE would illustrate what he meant if they gave him a committee, and he appealed to their honor and sense of justice to give him a committee. No man could deplore more than he did that the petitioner's house should have been taken possession of by the rebels, and though Mr. Montgomery was guilty of the crime laid to his charge, still when it was found that honors, appointments and high and lofty positions were conferred upon men far more guilty than he—because their education should have taught them better—he thought that the House could not refuse him for which he asked. The petitioner was now an honest man, however much he might have been misled before, and he (Colonel Prince) hoped the House would do him that justice which had been meted him in the other branch of the Legislature, for he felt convinced that justice had been refused him.

Hon. Mr. MOORE thought it unnecessary that the petition should be referred to a Select committee, as the House could not give the indemnity asked for, and they would be only stultifying themselves by receiving the petition.

Hon. Mr. ROSS regretted that after an interval of more than twenty years a debate should have taken place in this House which involved a reference to the events of 1837, and he thought it most unwise that at this distance of time the trial of the respective parties who were implicated in the rebellion should be commenced anew. Only a short time since he (Mr. Ross) saw rebel army commissions bearing the signature of the petitioner.

Hon. Col. PRINCE called the hon. gentleman to order. It was not fair for his hon friend to refer to commissions said to have been signed by Mr. Montgomery, when he objected to a committee being appointed to enquire into these allegations. He (Col. Prince) asserted that Mr. Montgomery did not sign these commissions.

Hon. Mr. ROSS asserted that he did, and he was sure a majority of the House would reject the motion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said if these cases were entertained there would be no end to them. Within the present week he had received a request from a person to present a petition claiming £500 for losses said to have been incurred during the Lower Canadian revolt.

Hon. Mr. PATTON said he had been requested to present a petition from one who had suffered grievous losses; but he had been advised that the sufferer ought to have urged his claim before the Commissioners, and that having neglected to do so, he could not now seek redress. Here, however, was a man figuring upon the statute books as having been convicted of treason, and who was a recipient of the favors of the Crown, requesting that indemnity which could not now be extended to those who had been loyal to their Queen and true to their country. Were they to be told that the jury who convicted Mr. Montgomery were actuated by strong partizan feelings? Language of that sort was an insult to the House, casting as it did a reflection upon the mode of administering justice in this country, and it ought not to be permitted. His hon. friend had asked where was the difference between the offence of this man and that of others now high in office; but he (Mr. Patton) cared nothing about the offences of others—Mr. Montgomery had been convicted as a felon, and it was an insult to the Legislature for him to demand compensation for what he had suffered.

Hon. Col. PRINCE replied, and implored the House to pause before they rejected the resolution.

The motion was then put and lost—three voting for and twenty-three against it. Those who supported the motion were Hons. Colonel Prince, and Messrs. Dessaulles and Morris.

Will there be War in Utah?

As we intimated last week, the President has appointed civil Commissioners to accompany the Utah army—Governor Powell and Major M'Cullough. These gentlemen are instructed to endeavor to bring Brigham Young to reason before forcible measures are taken; and it is stated to be the opinion of Mr. Bernhisel, the Mormon delegate to Congress, that, had they been sent twelve months ago, the expense and trouble of the Utah expedition might have been spared.

At the time our latest advices left Utah Territory, the middle of February, Brigham Young had notified General Johnston that he and his force must vacate their quarters and betake themselves homeward to the States by the 10th of March. It may be that this notice was merely intended as a bravado. The Mormons are adepts at the art of brag. But if the menace was intended seriously—if it be the design of the Mormons really to insist on the withdrawal of the United States troops from the Territory, we know enough of General Johnson's character and intentions to feel certain that a terrible conflict must already have taken place, and that either our little army has been severely cut up, or that it has cut its way into Salt Lake City. In either event it strikes us that the attitude of the Peace Commissioners, on arriving at the scene of action, will be somewhat ridiculous.

We expressed, last week, our views of the policy of dispatching civil Commissioners in the train of army to act as advisers and school-masters to the general commanding. However, as the new commander of the Utah army, General Smith, seems to have made no protest against the appointment of Powell and M'Cullough, we presume he does not anticipate that any inconvenience will arise from it. It is his affair.

But, at any rate, the Administration seems to be in a pretty dilemma. If the Peace Commissioners settle the business without fighting, how will the President reconcile it on his conscience to have spent such an enormous sum on so unnecessary military expedition—the mere loss in cattle amounting to many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and every barrel of flour eaten by the army having cost the Government, it is said, one hundred dollars? And if the Mormons fight, how will Mr. Buchanan explain his only sending Peace Commissioners to the scene of action when the battle has been fought?—Harper's Weekly.

Hands to Scientific Purpose.

Very few persons, outside of the foreign trading community, comprehend the whole importance of the statement which has been circulated in the papers latterly—that exchange on London has ranged from 102 to 108. It is, however, a fact of the highest moment to the entire community. Just to explain it in a sentence. The par of exchange between the United States and Great Britain in 1849 is that is to say, when bills on England can be bought here at 109, there is no amount of money flowing either way. Whenever over claimed it [illegible] Accordingly, you find that when exchange [illegible] the Bank of England, the money [illegible] Clint, and almost all our heavy [illegible] discharges. [illegible] above par, owing to the [illegible] 110, or 111. When, on the contrary, we are not debtors but creditors of the foreign world, exchange on London falls below par, that is to say, below 109. The meaning, therefore, of the decline in foreign exchange is, that we are liquidating our foreign debt, and piling up abroad a balance in our favor.

This anomalous fact is partially explained by the Custom-house returns at this port, which, as every one knows, is the largest importing port in the United States. During the three months ending on March the 31st, our importation of foreign goods fell short of those of the corresponding months of last year by thirty-six millions of dollars. Our importation for the nine months which have elapsed of the current fiscal year—notwithstanding that they include three months of enormous speculation, importation and general commercial activity last fall—fall short of those of the corresponding period of the former fiscal year by nearly thirty millions of dollars. In other words, assuming the operations of the past three months as the basis of calculation, the people of the United States are at present retrenching their consumption of foreign merchandise and manufactures to two-thirds of what they were before the late panic. The consequence of this we see in the fall of foreign exchange.

We are, in fact, at the present moment becoming creditors of the world at large. Whether we shall remain so depends upon the conduct of our people. Last fiscal year we sold to foreign countries, in round figures, three hundred and sixty-two millions of our produce, and took from them in exchange three hundred and sixty millions of produce and manufactures. If we had dispensed with one-third of these latter—as we are now doing—there would have been a balance not of two, but of one hundred and twenty-two millions of dollars in our favor, which we could have drawn at pleasure in specie.

It rests with the people of the United States to decide whether they will, or will not, become the bankers of the world. If they resolutely determine to curtail their consumption of foreign luxuries—to buy as few silks, laces, watches, jewelry, wines, foreign hardware, cottons, woolens, and linens, tea, coffee, sugar, and fruits, as absolute necessity requires—in a very few years New York will occupy the place now filled by London in the commercial community, and this will be the general bank of the trading world. Foreigners can not dispense with our cotton, corn, wool, and tobacco; we can do without a great portion of their manufactures. It only needs a little resolute economy on the part of our rich people. If every father of a family would make a rule to use no foreign luxuries of any kind, the battle would be won. If every lady would agree to dispense with foreign silks and laces for two or three years, half the work would be accomplished. If wine-drinkers would agree to do without Champagne and claret till 1862, there would be no need of self-denial after that date.

The solution of the problem rests with the consumers—that is to say, the great public of the United States. So long as they will buy, merchants will import. So long as they do import on the scale of recent years, we shall, as a nation, accumulate nothing. It is simply a question of a few years' abstinence from unnecessary luxuries.

The question has been confused by foolish endeavors of the manufacturers to involve it in the protectionist dispute. People who would gladly exclude foreigners from our markets have been led to support them by the selfish efforts of certain classes here to obtain a legislative monopoly of those markets. In reality, there is no need of any laws on the subject. If people are resolved to spend their money on foreign luxuries, all the laws in the world will not prevent them, and the balance of trade will remain against us; if, on the contrary, the American people at large realize the importance of becoming creditors, instead of debtors, of the foreign world, they will, without any laws, cease to consume more than is absolutely necessary of foreign merchandise, and the United States will rapidly become the mart, centre, and focus of the commercial world.—Harper's Weekly.

Our Foreign Ministers.

It was well understood, when Mr. Buchanan was inaugurated, that notwithstanding the identity of political principle between him and his predecessor, the foreign representatives of the United States would all give place to new men. It was considered convenient that, in order to reward his supporters, the President should have the patronage of the foreign appointments, just as completely as if he had succeeded a chief magistrate of a hostile party. There was a reason for this independent of the exigencies of party. It was notorious that Mr. Pierce's diplomatic service had been miserably inefficient. With the exception of Mr. Buchanan himself, none of Mr. Pierce's appointees seemed to have done any thing at all. Their performance had been confined to drawing their salary, and occasionally dining and wining Americans of adequate caliber. They had achieved no purpose whatever, so far as the national interests were concerned. It was therefore very justly argued that the nation could bear up bravely against their dismissal, and the appointment of new men as their stead.

Hitherto Mr. Buchanan seems to have been in no hurry to fill the diplomatic vacancies which the rule of rotation had open to him. He has sent a new min to Prussia, another to Sweden, another to the Hague, several to Mexico and Central America, and one or two others to other second rate courts. But the most important missions are still filled by the appointees of Mr. Pierce. Mr. Dallas still represents the country in England, and Mr. Mason continues to entertain with genial hospitality in Paris.

So far as England is concerned, it seems likely that this important appointment will delay, because the Central Government and Parliament are both so occupied in Washington just at this crisis, Mr. Buchanan's successor finds it impossible to get a hearing. Under the circumstances, Mr. Dallas's position must become a sinecure of the most ridiculous character. But the case is very different with regard to Mr. Mason. According to Mr. Claiborne's report to the State Department, France lately took from us in a single year over fifty millions' worth of our produce, and we consumed no less than ninety-eight millions of French manufactures and wines. All this trade was carried on at a grievous disadvantage to us. Our produce paid exorbitant duties on entering France; the French manufactures which we consumed were taxed in favor of the French empire; and our ships were obliged to contribute their share towards the maintainance of Louis Napoleon in the shape of differential tolls. It should be the business, it would seem, of an active diplomatic agent to press upon the government of the French the policy of rectifying the unequal regulations under which our trade is carried on. If Mr. Mason has bestirred himself in the matter no evidence of his labors has transpired; and it is fair to assume either that he has failed in his purpose, or that he has made no endeavor to achieve any reform at all. In either case it would appear to be proper to give some one else an opportunity of attempting to do something.

Mr. Buchanan's administration is now so far advanced that but little advantage can be reaped by the retention of patronage. Let us have new ministers abroad at all the foreign courts, and perhaps the country may cease to consider the diplomatic service a dead loss.—Harper's Weekly.

Usury Laws.

The last great financial panic, if it has exercised no other moral, has at least illustrated the folly of all usury laws. A legal standard for money was first originated by England, when wishing to borrow for herself, she made it penal to charge above a certain sum for its hire. In this country each State has its legal rate of interest, ranging from six per cent. to ten; this legal rate, as a general thing, being a dead letter in all business transaction, only coming into positive play in the loaning of money upon bond and mortgage, or in some investment of solidity; and frequently in these cases evaded by a system of bonus by which the lender gets a much larger price.

Money is as much a commodity of commerce as flour, beef or wool; its price will be governed by its scarcity in the market, and the demand. In the late panic there was not actually a less quantity of money in the country than before; the simple trouble proceeded from the fact that those who dealt in it and had large stocks in hand would not sell. The principle was carried out as in the cotton and grain trade. They would not sell because they feared the solvency of their customers. All wanted money, their debts must be paid; those who wanted were willing to pay according to its scarcity, and its market value therefore went up 24, 36, 48 per cent per annum, or any other price in accordance with the risk of the seller. Soon came the reaction.—Most commercial houses could not live at such rates; they preferred, wisely, to suspend. Those who had small amounts to pay, paid, and the demand for money ceased.—As soon as the demand ceased, then came the seller into market with his accumulated stock, but could not afford to sell it when it did not pay. A market must be found.—Money went down, down, until it became a drug at legal interest. There was no business doing to use it, consequently no buyers. The holders were looking in every direction for places to put their depleted purses. Railway shares, bank stock, that a few weeks before was spurned, now leaped up, paying dividends from 7 to 12 per cent, when money was down to 5 in the street. What wonder that the holders sought investment. Up went the stock; Third street, Wall street and State street went mad. It was the Utopia of brokers. Uncle Sam advertises for bids for his Treasury notes, and received offers as low as three per cent. The market is glutted with money. There is no outlet for it in trade, and if it were, the holder, having before his eyes that vague, indistinct shadow, the usury laws, cannot use. He cannot, because he is unwilling to take the risks of trade at the same price as he can get for it on bond and mortgage or on stocks. He is denied the privilege accorded to any other dealer, to charge for his merchandise in accordance with the risk he runs in obtaining payment.

In England, the Bank governs the rate of interest; as speculation rises or panic fills the commercial world, the Bank goes up to check the demand; during the height of the late panic the rate was up to 10, it is now down to 4. It is not uncommon to see money in London at 2, 2½ and 3 per cent., and that while the bank rates are almost double.

Our banking system is, when the demand becomes greatest, to make the discounts smaller. It was this false system that caused the late revulsion, and all its attendant consequences.

As well might we legislate to control any other branch of business as the trade in money. All usury laws simply hamper commerce, palsy the young dealer, and clothe the active channels of trade. It is not the old standard houses that are affected by the price of money, they are the ones who would uphold the system. As long as it lasts, so long can they shave their neighbor's note, through the medium of a broker, at 2 or 3 per cent a month, 24 to 36 the small dealer, who undertakes on a large number of scattered businesses through the country is if anything rode worse with broth or exchangers, for his profits in the long run is there is nothing but discounting among the brokers, and his note goes to the second rate of a hazy shave, who knows, perhaps, little thinking it, that the borrower is obliged to pay one to him already in bank against the borrower. Remove the restrictions on the legal rate of money, and all this vicious system falls to the ground.—Cincinnati Commercial.

Mammoth Nuggets.

The Mining correspondence shows that the diggings continue very rich and productive. Two unusual rich nuggets were found in Feather river, one weighing 17 pounds, and the other 11 pounds. The latter was found by a Mexican, who sold it for $3,000. Another nugget was found in Yuba county, weighing 7 pounds. The yield of gold in California is estimated at $50,000,000 per annum. Manly Exercise.

Our young men pay too little attention to their physical training. After the usual daily business, which is chiefly of a sedentary character, they resort to the billiard saloons or theatres or drinking houses for recreation, where they pass their evenings in a manner unprofitable both in a pecuniary and healthful point of view. Instead of wasting their health and time in these close and heated saloons, how much better would it be to devote an hour or two each evening to exercises in the gymnasium, on the natural development of their muscles and the strengthening of their physical powers. The benefit to be derived from a proper course of physical training is incalculable; it will not be found only in improved health, in vigorous elasticity, in capability to do and to endure, but it will be seen in the increased activity of the mind, in the manly tone of sentiment, in the buoyant spirits and the consciousness of vital existence. Our immediate attention was called to the consideration of this subject by a visit we paid to Ottingeon's Gymnasium last week. The occasion was an exhibition of his pupils, when we saw feats of strength and agility which would have tasked severely many of our public acrobats.—Contrast these young and vigorous athletes with the puny, wretched specimens of men that every hour cross our path, and the virtue of gymnasium exercises will at once be apparent. We do not think that parents pay sufficient attention to the physical training of their children. They fancy that if they take care of their heads they do all that is necessary, or should be expected from them. They, in fact, expend their brains on the hot-house principle, and leave their forms to be dwarfed for the want of healthy and energetic exercise. This reproach is applicable not only to the education of boys, but becomes even a graver reproach when considered in connection with the education of girls. Boys will run riot and get exercise somehow or the other, but our girls, bound up by the social restrictions which clog their every action, grow up as beautiful but fragile weeds, utterly unfitted physically for the duties of wife and mother. Artificiality is the end and aim of modern education, and Nature, with all its free and beautiful instincts, is sedulously kept out of view, or revealed only to be ashamed for avoidance. All this is wrong, but it is not beyond the power of remedy. The evil has been growing upon us under the guise of fashion, which only recognises ladies and gentlemen, ignoring men and women. The effete race which has sprung up under this baneful influence will die out, and the public sentiment will demand the physical as well as the mental training, that the de-cendants of the men and women of the Revolution, the heirs of giants, shall not become dwarfed to pigmies.—Leslie's Ill. Newspaper.

HALIFAX, April 23.

The Canada, Capt. Lang, from Liverpool, Saturday, 10th inst., arrived at this port shortly before noon to-day. Her advices are three days later than those by the City of Washington, at New York.

The steamship North American, from Portland, arrived on the 8th inst.

The general news brought by this arrival is not of much importance, excepting what is contained in the advices from India.

The dates from Bombay are to the 18th of March. Previous to that date the British troops had made their grand attack upon Lucknow, and the city had fallen.—The rebels fled from their strongholds in the greatest disorder and confusion, and were hotly pursued by the British cavalry and artillery. There was not much hard fighting at the capture, and the losses were light, the rebels making but a feeble resistance. At the last advices, the whole city was in possession of the British.

There had been quite a panic in Calcutta in consequence of a wide spread fear of an outbreak among the natives, but it turned out to have been unfounded.

There is nothing later from China.

COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Liverpool cotton market opened for the week at a considerable advance in prices on all grades; but consequently there was a partial falling off, and the market closed quiet, at an advance of about (to ½ of the rates as per advices by the Africa. The sales for the week amount to about 77,000 bales.

The Liverpool breadstuff market was generally quiet. Provisions, also, were without any movement of importance.

Consols had declined, and closed for money at 96¾ to 96¾.

Let's Dark Side.—There are in New York city nearly 40,000 women who sew for a living. About 12,000 of these are shirtmakers, 11,000 tailoresses and vestmakers, 4,400 cloak and mantilla makers, 3,000 dressmakers and milliners, besides those employed in other branches of needlework. Most of these women have from out of employment during the past winter only about 2,000 of them, it is said, have had work to do during that period. Shirtmakers generally receive twenty-five cents a day. The introduction of sewing machines has thrown against many out of employment.

Open Jewish Farmer in America.—

It is a singular fact, revealed in the last census of the United States, that while there are seven hundred thousand farmers in that country, only one person who is a Jew registered as a farmer. Be liberally in the future of their dispersion fulfilled, that they are strangers to that occupancy, which above all others, implies a permanent home? "Yes, land and commerce," said I, still with the hopes of Israel, strong in me, "and the Jews are fast becoming a power in the soil where they are found, ready on an instant to engage in agriculture." In California they follow the principle [illegible] result of the system they have found to be [illegible] They merely scrape away the surface of the country, and [illegible] those lucky old Jews who commenced [illegible] so occupied.

Revolution in Venezuela.—On the 15th of March a revolution, under the lead of General Castro, broke out and overthrew the President, Monagas, who, with his wife and family, took refuge in the house of the French Minister. Perhaps there never was a more corrupt family than that of Monagas's. There is something quite ludicrous in the magnificence of Madame Monagas's pecadilloes; she very coolly seized the custom-house of Laguayra, and constituted its revenues as her pin-money. Its receipts were about 700,000 dollars per annum.—Castro has been chosen President pro tem, that is, till the Convention meet. The popular opinion is that General Paez will be invited to return.

Anecdote of Havelock.—During the stay in England of General Havelock, the narrator went one evening to his house, in compliance with an invitation. In the course of conversation, Mrs. Havelock turned suddenly round to her husband and said, "By the way, my dear, where is Harry?" referring to her son, whom she had not seen during the whole afternoon.—The Colonel started to his feet: "Well, poor fellow, he's standing on London bridge, and in this cold, too. I told him to wait for me there at twelve o'clock to-day; and in the pressure of business at ———, I forgot the appointment." The father and son were to have met at twelve o'clock at noon, and it was now after seven o'clock in the evening; yet the father seemed to have no doubt that Harry would not move from his post. The Colonel at once rose, ordered a cab to be called, and, as he went forth to deliver his son of his weary watch on London Bridge, he turned round to excuse himself to his visitor, saying, "You see, sir, that's the discipline of a soldier's family." In the course of an hour the Col. returned with poor Harry, who, although he appeared to be somewhat affected by the cold watch, and glad to see the fire in the comfortable parlor at home, seemed to have passed through the little afternoon's experience with the greatest good humor, and the feeling that all was right.

The War to Obtain.

From the Correspondence of the Illustrated London News.

CANTON, Jan. 28, 1858.

On the 17th I left Canton and steamed down the river in the Forester gun-boat, to spend a day or two at Hong-Kong. Fourteen days, or rather nights, on hard planks, with sleep constantly disturbed by real or imaginary alarms, required a little rest in all conscience. How splendid Hong Kong appeared after the one-storied and narrow-laned Canton! Queen's road indeed tabled us if it deserved the name, and the merchants' houses here bore some resemblance to palaces. The very Chinese houses, whilst preserving their own style, have grown wonderfully in altitude, and would rather astonish their brick and mortar brethren up Canton side. Seen from a trifling distance, with the background composed of Magazine Hill, the remains of Gough Fort, and the white-clad mountain, it presents many beautiful points of view, interspersed as it is with trees, green always, and gardens full of vegetables. The views from the walls are likewise extremely beautiful; the intense green of the paddy-fields contrasting with the reddish-brown mountains to the north-east of the city; but it is from the back of Magazine Hill (head-quarters) that the finest panorama as to be seen,—innumerable miles of flats, paddy-fields, cultivated with Chinese perfection, spread out as far as the eye can reach, till they are lost among the hills in the hazy distance. A river intersects them, on which junks are visible; on the east a wild rocky appearance you from Gough's Hill. If you look down you'll see great holes made by the shells from the fleet. Gough's Hill is so covered with graves that it looks as though 10,000 moles had for centuries been at work upon it. Between Magazine Hill and the head-quarters (within the walls) is the five storied Pagoda—an edifice with real and fire spurious roofs, twisted up at the corners, like a swell's moustache; whilst below two fearful-looking lions guard the entrance. At the upper stories red coats are visible, and the Scotch tongue is audible; below are a number of individuals in blue, from whom now and then issue such words as "Cos mon d'ma pipe!" "Stare aim," &c., leaving no doubt in the spectator as to their nationality. On the north-west the city walls extend a little way, giving you a glimpse of grey-tiled roofs, all of the same shape and size, with here and there great banyan trees, with massive foliage, small towers, and stout crenated forts. Turn your back now on Magazine Hill and look down below your feet on your feet lies the fortified Canton. What impression does it produce upon you? Many street makes but a repetition of the former streets. You see one more narrow than, and the eternal grey roof. At this position she slightly above the roof, otherwise the height of all is much the same. The city regards upon the end of the map. The maps of the ships show you where the Wampoa passage—indeed you a prospect of hills; and to the right extend fairly along the walls on your left Fa-ti suburbs, and further, more densely covering and gorge. Such is Canton from this height.

ing three and wounding two. The dastardly scoundrel was not to be wrought by the survivors in the boat, because the mak was out of range in an instant. Piracy and murder on so daily occurrence, and I much fear many valuable lives will be lost ere this business is finished.

My first act on arriving in Hong Kong was to visit the Hercules hospital-ship, where so many of our gallant fellows are lying maimed and helpless. None of the scenes so vividly described by Russell in the Crimea were observed on board the Hercules. On mounting the deck I was met by a middle-aged gentleman of prepossessing exterior, who proved to be Dr. Burns, the inspector, whose kindness and attention whilst in charge of the hospital at Lisbon will be well remembered by all who had the fortune to be placed under his care. It is needless to say that permission to visit the wards was most politely accorded. Everything was in order. I am sorry to say that since the assault the loss has been on an average one man per day, either from wounds or dysentary. The hospital has been quite full, and the doctors all bore evidence in their careworn pale faces of the hard work which had fallen to their lot. This loss, however, is quite an exception to the rule, for though the climate is unhealthy, yet the skill of the doctors and the excellent sanitary arrangement have checked disease wonderfully, as the following figures will show:—From 1st of January, 1857, to 31st December, 1857, patients admitted, 978; patients cured, 768; patients died, 89.

I have sketched the quarters of some wounded officers. In spite of their being cripples they were a jolly set, and laughed and joked quite pleasantly. Lieut. Lord Gilford was shot in the arm whilst leading the storming party at Canton; Lieut. Butler received his wound from a bullet in the head nearly at the same time and place. Lieut. Daddon (Royal Marines) also wounded in the right arm, and characterised by the doctors as one of the most patient sufferers they had ever met with, never uttering a groan. Lieut. Pim, of the gun-boat Banterer, was also wounded, and under whose auspices I, for the first time, smelt powder; and very nasty it was. I am happy to say Pim is recovering from his many wounds. I was pressed to stop to tea, which appeared at five, hospital hours being breakfast at eight a. m; dinner, noon; tea, five. The officers were unanimous in praise of their medical men. Dr. Burns attends to the medical cases, Dr. Smart to the surgical. Dr. Smart is a Knight of the Legion of Honour, and is the officer who so nobly sustained the credit of his profession in the Crimea. It must be most gratifying to find his efforts so fully appreciated. Dr. Smart possesses a most unique collection of bullets extracted from the bodies of soldiers and sailors, who must ever gratefully remember the skill which relieved those unpleasant foreign bodies.

To make a long story short, the Circumlocution Office seems to have appointed the "right man" to look after the sick, and it is to be devoutly hoped they will now continue so laudable a practice.

On Wednesday the 20th the Imperador sailed with the Madras Native Infantry for Singapore, and she is to return with two Bengal regiments to replace them. The darkies expressed the greatest delight at leaving China. They had with them several Celestial trophies; among others a small Chinese boy whom they had turned into a Mussulman. It was a very pretty sight, the day very hot, and sun bright.

The hot season is approaching, and, if Canton be held, then many lives will be sacrificed, and the Cantonese be encouraged to attack the feeble garrison. A few regiments of Sepoys would be just the thing, besides enabling our present force to back Lord Elgin afterwards at the Court of Pekin. Moreover, the departure of a few sepoy regiments from India would doubtless be considered a good riddance.

To the superficial observer at home, the possession of the city of Canton, and the capture of Yeh, the third man in the empire, will appear everything that could be desired, and that now we have nothing to do but to dictate our own terms. There never could be a greater error. The truth is that we are further off the desired end than ever. One great mistake of the home Government is now apparent—I mean the employment of so many cooks. First there is Lord Elgin, Baron Gros; then we have General Straubeanze; and last, though not least, Admiral Seymour. Can unanimity be expected? Certainly not. The broth, therefore, will be spoiled; and I should not wonder if some of the cooks burnt their fingers.

It seems a thousand pities that Admiral Seymour was not left to manage the business after his own fashion. Under his able guidance this wretched lorcha "pigeon" would have been finished long ago.

Order is gradually being restored in the city. The streets (if you can call them so) assume a more lively aspect; shops are being opened in all quarters. At first the storekeepers only exposed the most trifling articles for sale; but, when they found their goods and persons respected, confidence returned, and John Chinaman shone out as the same money-making "critter" as before.

As a body, the inhabitants appear indifferent to their late humiliation, and submissive to their new rulers. Many officers make the natives bow as they pass. This they do to the smallest Mandarin, and these small observances are considered of great importance in all Eastern countries.

The Chinese New Year's-day (February 16) is now close at hand, and some anxiety is felt lest that time should be selected for an outbreak. The Celestials take plenty of samshu at that festive season: that alone would give them sufficient courage to face us again.

The site determined on for the foreign factories extends from the Five Gent Gate below the Dutch Folly up to the old Consoo-house (Marquee-street)—the French taking the section lowest down, the English the next up, and the American as of yore. The wall of the new city forms their best protection in the world against fire. As to the old city, about forty sign-boards, bearing in large white letters on a black ground—Rue de Flint, Rue des Gamins, Rue du Sud, Rue Heute, Rue de la Folie, Rue de l'Execution, Rue de la Parade, &c., sufficiently indicate its future fate and permanent building.

Hong Kong, Feby 15.

I have just come down from Canton to see Lieutenant Pim off. I was all through the city two days ago. What a change! The shops open: the streets thronged with the busy Celestials; fat and jolly porters crowded in considerable numbers through the narrow streets; English, French, and Chinese policemen—the former with the traditional truncheon, the latter looking as if they had just risen a step from being very much afraid Beadles of vestry-clerks. Every [illegible] with the exception of the [illegible] these streets, the finest of which is the one of triumphal arches. All these streets are paved with flagstones, and though narrow on purpose to keep out the sun, which even now is extremely hot, are clean and picturesque. The interior of the shops—or "stores," as the Hong-Kongites love to call them—are very lofty. Crowds of ever-smiling small boys accompany the visitor, stand outside gazing with mute astonishment on the Fanqui who is investing within; and, should said Fanqui be at all facetious, and, above all, indulge in a little Chinese chaff, he is certain to keep the good-humored gazers in a roar of laughter, and they will point out to him the best shops, and otherwise oblige him. The great things to buy are brass padlocks, in which the Cantonese excel. Bronzes and China are all the rage, but the best porcelain merchants have not opened yet; they don't do so till peace is proclaimed. The river is beginning to look itself again; the sampans are returning rapidly; and I expect that in a few weeks it will be a sight worth looking at, and afford good sketches. The weather in Canton is now very hot in the daytime, though it has been cold; but the Chinese winter, as far as I have seen of it, consists in two or three days of a very cold wind from the north-east, followed by calm weather and sultry heat. This is continually going on. Sometimes the wind will blow for three days, and then for five or ten days it will be hot; but of the fogs that I read of in a monthly magazine, and which that magazine stated continued for weeks in October, I have not seen them yet. One morning, at the end of November, it is true, there was fog, but it disappeared before nine a.m. On the contrary, the sky for days together is without a cloud, and an atmosphere that is perfection, when you can lie on the grass, gazing at the bright blue sky, for hours together, and enjoying the mere fact of existence, the butterflies fluttering about from flower to flower, the birds singing in the green trees. This is our winter here: the cold days now and then only make the others the more enjoyable.

The China New Year's-day is just over; it was ushered in by the most awful din of crackers going off all night, and lanterns hungup in every house. On the morning visits were paid, the Celestials bringing in their "pasteboard," a red piece of paper, on which is written their name, and wishing you "luck." I was highly delighted at being amongst the Chinese on the day in question. A table which groaned under the weight of sweetmeats was in the room, and round it were seated my Celestial friends, smoking paper cigars. Presently there came in a friend with a red paper in question, saying, "Coong he fat shoi" (may good luck attend you), upon which he or she gave the present (everybody gives presents), and in return was asked, "Oi cha" (have some tea.) Having done the tea, he or she received some money, neatly done up in very red paper; and, after a little conversation, departed. This continued all day and next day. The operation is in the following manner: A girl is sitting in her bedroom at a table, on which are the presents and tea; her friends are coming in likewise with "cumshaw" (presents.) The poor people bring in oranges. On this day are to be seen Chinese girls dressed as you see them in pictures; their hair full of flowers, their lips nicely rouged, and faces floured. They look beautiful, I assure you.

The strangest thing was to see the Celestials all idle for the first time—such an event only taking place once a year. I was determined not to be backward, so I got my name on red paper, and did in China as the Chinese do, much to their delight.

The blockade was raised on the 10th of February.

From the Boston Herald, April 30.

The execution of George W. Stovall, formerly of Virginia, and once a Baptist Minister, for the murder of Mary Ray Durand, with whom he was living at the time, took place in New Orleans on Friday, the 17th instant. The Picayune gives the following account of the execution:—

At quite an early hour all those who had the open sesame to the Parish Prison began to assemble, there being a general anxiety manifested to see how a man of education and good intellectual powers would approach such a doom as that which had been assigned to Stovall by the laws of his country.

When we entered the prison yard, our ears were first greeted by the sounds of sacred music which came from the doomed man's cell, and Stovall's own strong and peculiar voice could easily be distinguished by its earnest energy. In the cell with him were the Rev. Dr. Palmer, and other pastors of Protestant churches, and after the hymn was over prayers were in succession offered to the Throne of the Most High.

Shortly after eleven the prisoner dressed in white, and attended by his religious advisers, was led to the spot where the fatal trap had been prepared. His step was firm, and his appearance venerable and imposing. Directed by a motion, he took his seat, and the executioner adjusted the fatal noose. The prisoner then, after making some remarks, thanking the officers of the prison for their kindness to him, said:—

"Now, gentlemen, I must tell you that I have not been brought to this end because I didn't know better. I was raised in —— County, Virginia, by respectable parents, and received a pious education. Indeed, I may say I occupied a respectable position in society. But I fell, and for the last fifteen years have been led captive by the devil at his will, and now by an ignoble death, I am about to receive the wages of sin. I have even held the position of a minister of the Gospel, and was beloved and respected as such, but this only shows the height from which I have fallen, and from which all are liable to fall if they yield to their baser feelings. Though of late, I have returned from my wanderings to my Saviour, to the merciful Jesus, who to the dying thief said, "This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise." I feel that my spirit is like a caged bird, anxious to escape from its prison and seek for refuge in the Paradise of God. Oh, that I may have the happiness of meeting you all there! Lord, mercify this death to the salvation of these spectators. Let my prayer and my words go to the uttermost parts of the earth! O, gracious God, make us penitent in thy presence."

These remarks were made in a firm and unwavering voice, and after the prisoner closed, the Rev. Dr. Palmer offered up an impressive prayer for the culprit.

When the prayer was ended the prisoner took a last farewell to Dr. Dabney, Dr. Palmer, and the officers of the prison. He then, after the cap was pulled down over his face, unshrinkingly in a loud voice, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." As he uttered these words the trap fell, and his spirit took its flight to the realms of the hereafter.

The Great Paris Sewer.

The great argument, according to some authorities, in favour of the authenticity of the regal history of Rome, is the existence of the Cloaca Maxima, the great sewer by which the city was drained two thousand three hundred years since, and parts of which serve the same useful purpose to-day.

Under the orders of the present Emperor Napoleon, a gigantic sewer has been constructed in Paris with a view of carrying all the rain-water and drain-stuff from all the minor drains on the right side of the Seine into that river near the bridge of Asnieres. This monstrous work is even larger than the Cloaca Maxima of Rome, of which it is said that a loaded cart could be driven through it. The main tunnel is about eighteen feet wide, and fourteen feet high. Feeders of various sizes, communicating with street and house drains, traverse the curb on either side, and disembogue themselves into the stream which flows through the bed prepared for it. This bed is nearly eleven feet wide, by a trifle over four feet deep; so that it may be considered a small river. In dry seasons it is calculated that the drain-stuff will keep the sewer bed pretty full; in rainy seasons every preparation is made for the overflow of the water. There are cavities in the walls of the sewer, which are doors of escape for those who may be surprised by a sudden rush of water into the drain and an overflow of the curb. They are provided with safety ladders communicating with dry land above. Such precautions are the more necessary as, in the very rainy seasons which sometimes occur in Paris, it is estimated that the flow of water from above may absolutely fill the whole tunnel, and would of course drown any unfortunate workman who happened to be in at the time the torrent began.

The tunnel itself is about three miles long altogether. It is destined to carry off the drain-stuff not only from Paris itself but from the populous suburbs of Menilmontant and Montmartre. To provide against any rise or fall in the Seine which might interfere with the steady flow of liquid outward from the sewer, it is supplied with a system of locks at the point where it joins the river.

The great London drains have been lately the subject of much curious inquiry. Though they are neither as large nor as scientifically constructed as this Paris sewer, they are nevertheless very capacious subterranean tunnels, and may, with proper care, be traversed by visitors from end to end. The great danger to be apprehended from such an expedition is from the rats. The sewer rat is a peculiar variety of the genus. From feeding upon garbage their bite becomes venomous. At those great dog and rat fights which are common among the sporting men of London, the owner of the dog invariably stipulates that no sewer rat shall be introduced. Like church-vault rats, these denizens of the sewers become very fierce and bold when in a numerous body. They have frequently been known to attack the scavengers while engaged in their work.

A few years since, an unfortunate man, who had been reduced by intemperance to the position of scavenger, was sent down into one of the great London sewers to make the usual examinations—to clear away obstructions, and to inspect the solid matter which is gathered at gratings placed at intervals in the sewers. He was a very corpulent man, and much bloated by the use of ardent spirits. He descended into the sewer late in the afternoon, promising to return by nightfall. Night came, and he did not return. Unhappily no one thought enough about him to enquire what had become of him, or, if the idea occurred to any one, it was not unnaturally conjectured that he had emerged and had gone to the nearest tavern, as his wont was. Next morning his wife and child appeared at the office to inquire after him. Their questions aroused the attention of the agent in charge, and he directed a couple of men to descend instantly into the sewer in search of him.

They found a horrible spectacle on descending into that abode of filth and darkness. The unfortunate man lay with part of his body in the turbid stream, his head against the side of the sewer. He was quite dead and almost fleshless. When the two men first saw him, they estimated that a thousand rats were at work devouring him. Around him lay many score of dead rats, whose corpses attested the vigor with which he had defended his life. His cheeks, nose, and eyes were gone. His intestines were mostly devoured, and the bulk of the flesh was gnawed from his legs and arms. At the first approach of the new-comers, the rats evinced a strong disposition to contest possession of the corpse. As the men approached they flew at them with tiger-like ferocity. To drive them away, the scavengers were compelled to resort to a well-known method: by a mixture of chemical ingredients they produced an ammoniacal flame which rats can not endure, and by this means recovered possession of the horrid skeleton of their unhappy comrade.

Old scavengers have been heard to declare that they would rather meet a well-armed burglar than a squad of these sewer rats on a foraging expedition, unless they were provided with their chemicals. The sewer rat, when he has resolved upon an attack, runs with peculiar swiftness upon his adversary. At the moment the man aims a blow at the rat who is dashing at his feet, the vermin is biting his stomach or his throat. If the rats are numerous, and the man has no means of defence but a common weapon, he must have an avenue of escape or he is gone. These safety ladders have been added to the Paris sewer partly with this view.

At the locks at the extremity of the Paris sewer proper gratings are provided to facilitate an examination of the matter which passes through the drain into the river. It may not be generally known that Pactolus, with all his golden sands, did not flow to the sea more richly freighted than the great sewers of metropolitan cities. The slime, and filth, and garbage, and refuse of all kinds which roll their unfragrant bulk through the underground channel contain, every day, the most precious products of human industry and ingenuity. If the sewerage stuff of New York could be sifted thoroughly, the right of retaining the valuables buried would be worth a princely fortune. In London the scavengers constantly find in the sewers such articles as bank-notes, valuable papers of various kinds, lace handkerchiefs and trimmings, pieces of silk (sometimes whole, having evidently been thrown into the sewers by thieves who were chased and took that method of getting rid of the evidence of their crime), jewelry of every kind, rings, bracelets, ear-rings, breast-pins, chains, pocket-books, purses, silver spoons and forks, small articles of plate, &c., &c., &c. Of these, many find their way into the sewers through the carelessness of servants. Thieves—under a pretence of [illegible] others. The thieves are seldom dropped in the street which the first rain naturally floats into the common receptacle.

The Paris sewer was somewhat impeded in its progress by the necessity of guarding against a landslip in parts where the earth above had an unusual weight to bear. In one part of its course it passes under a railway. This part was peculiarly dangerous, and, until the sewer was complete, the railway company was prohibited from running heavy trains over the spot; even the lightest trains were ordered to proceed as slow as possible on approaching that point. When the London drains were opened they met with very different obstacles. At several points they intersected with subterranean channels, which, up to that time, had remained quite unknown to the police. These channels, or tunnels, had been used for generations, it is supposed, by thieves and malefactors. Some of them led to the Thames; into these murdered bodies were thrown, and left to float out into the river. Others were convenient channels of escape for burglars and other criminals when hard pressed by the police. The English novelist, Harrison Ainsworth, turned the discoveries of unlawful subterranean passages to good account in his "Jack Sheppard" and other romances, which were published at the time the construction of the sewers led to these discoveries.

Even in modern times criminals have frequently sought refuge in sewers. Some years since, under one of the last Bourbons, the police and public of Paris were appalled by the commission of an atrocious crime.—An old lady and her daughter—both members of the first society of Paris, and the latter one of its fairest ornaments—were discovered murdered in the house which they occupied alone. It was evident that they had been robbed and shockingly abused previous to death. Circumstances, which may not here be repeated, pointed to two notorious villains, who had lately been released from prison, as the criminals. All Paris was on the alert. The King, the municipality, the family of the murdered ladies, and various other prominent citizens offered high rewards for the detection of the scoundrels, and that large body of idlers who are ready for anything instantly turned detectives for the nonce, and gave their aid to the regular police. Not a nook or cranny in the old city was left unexplored, but all without result. Suddenly, in the midst of the excitement, one of the principal sewers became choked up. The consequences were so disagreeable that measures were at once taken to discover the stoppage, and a very few hours' work brought to light the bodies of the two criminals jammed into a narrow part of the old sewer, and perfectly embedded in a mass of filth and garbage. From the position in which they were found it seemed likely that they had tried, after finding refuge in the sewer, to make their way out of it, probably in search of food; but that, whether from incaution or accident, they had contrived to jam themselves into a corner from which they had not the power to creep out. The effluvia would soon cause death in such a case.

The old Dublin story may serve as a pendant to this. Many years ago, as people were trudging along Sackville street, in Dublin, on a bright morning, a voice was heard issuing from the mouth of a sewer—"Help! help! I'm stifling! Good Lord—good people, get me out!"

In an instant the street was crowded with people, and the police, who had attempted to take the lead in investigating the matter, were roughly driven aside. Half a dozen sympathetic individuals volunteered to communicate with the imprisoned tenant of the sewer.

"Where are ye, darlint?" shouted they, with their noses in the dirt.

"He's alive!" shouted the leaders of the mob; and to work fell the crowd instantly, under their command, to tear up the street. With pick, and spade, and shovel, and crow-bar, they fell upon the pavement—working so furiously that in a very few minutes the drain was laid bare. There were no signs of the prisoner.

"Sure he's fainted—the poor crathur!"

And the crowd fell to, more ardently than before, digging and delving, till a full acre of the pavement of the street was torn up. Still no signs of the miserable prisoner were seen.

Just at that moment a squadron of horse-police arrived at the scene of action, and the mob took to their heels instinctively.—The magistrates had been told that a clever ventriloquist had played the trick on the mob, without dreaming of the consequences. But it is generally believed to this day, among the people of Dublin, that the voice came from a poor Irish patriot, whom the ruthless Saxons stifled to death in the drain, sorra.

Toronto Spring Assizes.

Saturday, April 24th.

Trial for Murder.

Thomas Orr was placed at the bar, charged with murdering James Whreghitt, on the evening of the 29th of January last, in the house of Jas. McDonough, tavern keeper, Klineburgh. The prisoner in a clear and distinct voice pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Phillpotts conducted the prosecution on the part of the Crown.

Jas. McDonough—I live in Klineburgh, and keep a tavern. I know the prisoner at the bar. He came to my house on the evening of the 29th of January, about half-past ten o'clock. He was accompanied by his son; they came into the bar-room. The deceased and George Huggart were in the room at the time. I was partly undressed previous to going to bed. When they came in I went into the bar-room. I said "good evening James" to the son. He replied, that I had not used him well the last time he was at my place. I inquired in what manner? He answered that the last time he had slept at my house that I had not given him a good bed. I said I had not done so, and said my wife was cleanly in her habits, and kept clean beds, and that he had left the bed dirty. I then said this is a late hour to come and raise a row in my house. I then asked them to leave the house, but they refused. The prisoner as yet had not interfered. They both appeared to have been drinking. I went towards them to try and put them out. The prisoner then took hold of me. I laid hold of him by the collar and gave him a shake, and he fell on the hearth. He got up and then both got at me. I laid hold of the son and he pulled me out at the door. Neither of us were on the ground while we were out. We did not strike each other. We only pulled and jerked each other about. I went back into the house first. Whreghitt was then lying on the ground and Huggart was struggling with the prisoner for a shovel he had in his hand. We managed to get it away from him. I then directed my attention to Whreghitt, and lifted him from the floor. He was then conscious. He went to the basin and washed some blood from his nose and face. He had received the blow over the left temple. It was bruised, but not cut. I put the prisoner and his son out. Whreghitt said that he was badly hurt on that morning afterwards. He was so unwell, that a doctor was sent for. He died about ten o'clock next day.

Cross-examined—There was no difficulty, until I ordered them out. They had no drink in my house. When I ordered them out, I did not think they were acting civil. I did not knock the prisoner down; I only pushed him and he fell. Huggart only assisted me to take the shovel from him. I did not see the blow struck. Deceased, after he was struck by the prisoner, said he was not much hurt, and would be able to work on Monday. He was about thirty or forty years of age and stout.

George Huggart—I was in the service of the last witness as hostler, in January last. I remember the prisoner and his son coming into the bar, one night about ten o'clock; Whreghitt was in the room along with me; the prisoner was accompanied by his son. Mr. McDonough bade the prisoner "good night;" the prisoner's son said that McDonough had not given him a good bed the last night he had slept at the house. A quarrel commenced between them with the prisoner, his son and McDonough; the prisoner and his son then crowded up to McDonough; the prisoner struck McDonough; McDonough had ordered the prisoner out of the bar. They had not, up to the time I allude to, asked for a bed, or asked for drink. Whreghitt opened the door to put him out; he stood by the door; it opened inwards; the prisoner was pushed down to the ground; McDonough and the prisoner commenced scuffling together; prisoner got hold of the fire shovel after he got up from the ground; he struck me over the shoulder with it; Whreghitt was standing about a yard from the fireplace; the prisoner struck me and then turned round and struck Whreghitt; he struck him on the left temple; Whreghitt fell on his face; Catherine Cooney saw deceased struck; Whreghitt crept into the hall on his hands and knees; McDonough and the son of the prisoner were out of the bar room for a few minutes; while they were out the prisoner lifted the shovel the second time; he was looking towards Whreghitt; I do not know whom he intended to strike. Deceased got up and washed himself; after he had been struck I got the prisoner down, and I, with McDonough's assistance, took the shovel from him; we then put the prisoner and his son out. Deceased said he was hurt, but would soon recover; he went shortly afterwards and washed himself; deceased was struck with the flat of the shovel.

Cross-examined—Prisoner appeared as if he had been drinking. After the quarrel had taken place, McDonough threatened to put them out; McDonough was standing in the room in front of the counter; I cannot say whether he moved up to prisoner as if to strike him; prisoner struck him, and then McDonough pushed him down; I cannot tell whether he fell heavily to the ground or not; I was only looking on; I saw him pick up the shovel; I got him down again and endeavoured to get the shovel; McDonough assisted me; we succeeded in getting it from him; I cannot say how many were engaged in putting the prisoner out of the bar-room.

Catherine Cooney.—I was servant with McDonough; I was in bed up stairs on the evening referred to; I heard loud voices in the bar-room; I got out of bed and came down stairs; I saw the prisoner with a shovel in his hand; he was making a blow at deceased; Haggart ran towards the door where I stood, away from the prisoner; prisoner struck deceased on the temple; deceased fell to the ground on his back; prisoner tried to strike again, but Huggart caught hold of the prisoner; Mr. McDonough came in when the prisoner and Huggart were struggling for the shovel; I cannot say what words had been exchanged before I came down stairs.

Cross-examined—When I went up stairs I knew no voice but McDonough's. It was angry talking. The prisoner was standing up with the shovel raised over his shoulder. Deceased was standing between the window and the door. Huggart got hold of the prisoner, and I helped to get the shovel away from him. Huggart held prisoner down, and had his knee on his chest. Mrs. McDonough said, "Mr. Orr has the shovel and he will murder us all." She was running out of the bar-room as I came to the door.

Mrs. McDonough—I saw my husband try to put the prisoner out, when his son caught hold of my husband. Prisoner was on the ground. Neither deceased nor Huggart were taking part in the struggle. I saw the prisoner with the shovel uplifted, but I ran away before he struck. When I came back I saw deceased and the prisoner struggling on the floor.

Cross-examined—I did not see my husband knock prisoner down. James Orr ran to catch hold of my husband, and they both went out of the house. Wreghitt died next day.

Dr. Chaffey—I reside at Klineburgh. I was called to attend deceased early on the following morning after he had been struck. I saw a discoloration over the left eye, and a slight "puff" over the left temple. He was insensible from the effects of the blow. I did all I could for him. I saw him a second time about 9 or 10 o'clock. He was then insensible. The skin was not broken. I am of opinion that it might have been done with the flat side of a shovel.

Cross-examined—I made an external examination. I gave him up at the second visit, as there appeared to be no hope that deceased would live.

Dr. Stevenson—I reside in Klineburgh. I made a post-mortem examination of the body of the deceased on the 30th January last. We found a fracture on the left temple. I have no doubt but that death resulted from fracture of the skull. The part of the skull where the blow was struck was quite thin. Dr. McHaffie assisted me here.

This closed the case for the Crown.

The Defence.

John Orr—I am the son of the prisoner. I was with my father when he went into McDonough's tavern to get some refreshments on the night in question. McDonough, Wreghitt and Huggart were all in the bar-room. The two latter were standing close to the fire. Father said as he entered, "It is a cold night, gentlemen," but no one made a reply. Father then asked for some liquor. McDonough refused, and said if he did not leave the house he (McD.) would kick him out. Father asked what was that for. McDonough replied, "You complained of the bed you made the last time you slept in the house." He then came up and struck the prisoner on the breast. The deceased hitched my father on the knee as he fell on the floor. The brother—Huggart joined in, and father cried out when they were abusing him, "Oh, don't kill me!" McDonough's wife also cried out several times, "Don't kill Mr. Orr" (the prisoner.) I tried to help my father. McDonough when I endeavoured to do so struck me. Deceased opened the door, but he saw that the brother could not keep my father down, and went to help him. The brother struck my father on the nose with the shovel. Deceased shut the door. Some time after, McDonough followed and said, "I fell after he had struck me. I went into the bar-room again. Father was gone when I went back. I went and got the pony, and we went away.

Cross-examined—We were going to Mr. Wallace's about five miles beyond McDonough's. It was about ten o'clock at night when we got to McDonough's. I do not remember how often we had drank during the day. We stopped a few weeks before at McDonough's. He said next morning that he would charge five York shillings for the horse provender and our beds. Father said it was shanty for bad beds. We then went away. When we went in on the night in question, McDonough was standing up. He then sat down to pull off his boots. He had only on his trowsers. McDonough came up and knocked my father down. Father fell towards the hearth. McDonough struck him in the chest. As father fell, deceased who was standing close to the fire place, kicked at him and struck him on the knee. After he was down, the whole three kicked him severely while he was down. I went to catch McDonough when he kicked me and knocked me down. I got a blow in the face which cut me. McDonough told the deceased to open the door and they put me out. The hostler saw he was not able to keep my father down, so he caught up the shovel and struck my father with it. They then struggled for the shovel. I was then put out. Mrs. McDonough came in as my father was knocked down, and when she saw them kick the prisoner, she cried out "Don't kill Mr. Orr" (the prisoner.) The only reason that I know of why McDonough struck father was because he had complained of the beds. Both of us had been working in the neighbourhood as painters and were well known there.

Robert Mackay—I recollect the evening of the disturbance. I was at McDonough's till all was over. I was at Mr. Stevens' stables and went up to see what was the matter, when I heard the voice. While going up I heard the yell and then a second yell. I ran up briskly. I met the prisoner's son coming towards him. He was in his shirt-sleeves, and bare-headed. I tried to get in, but all the doors were fastened. I called out to McDonough through the window to open the door. The prisoner was outside lying partly on the platform. He said nothing to me. Mrs. McDonough, sen., told me to take out the clothes and traps belonging to the prisoner and his son. I did so. I saw them lift up deceased and take him to the washstand to wash himself. I said to deceased, "Were you drunk?" He replied, "No." I asked what he and "Old Orr" had quarrelled about. He said he did not have any quarrel with him, but that Orr had struck him with the shovel a pretty hard blow, but he thought he would get over it. The boy came in and got his coat. Deceased was given to drink, and that was the reason I asked him if he had been drinking. I cannot say if the prisoner had been drinking. I heard the noise first while I was in the stable. The yelling seemed to be as if a number of persons were fighting.

Re-examined—I saw McDonough strike the prisoner. It was after I gave the boy his coat. He attempted to strike the boy in the bar-room. The prisoner was standing outside when McDonough struck him.

Thos. White.—I live in Klineburg. My store is opposite McDonough's tavern. I heard a noise on the night in question. It was so great that, although the store was shut, we heard it plainly in the kitchen. I heard a voice calling out "murder." I supposed it to be Mr. Orr's (the prisoner) voice. There was a great disturbance; we thought it was a fight.

Cross-examined—Upon going to the street I saw some persons who were being put out of McDonough's tavern. There were three or four persons. McDonough is a quiet regular man. The prisoner is a quiet respectable man, and I have always seen him decent in his conduct.

Mrs. White corroborated the testimony of Mr. White.

James McDonough recalled and examined by Mr. Cameron—I do not recollect that I told Wm. Cummerford that I had given young Orr a severe beating, such as he would not forget, but I may have said so.

By Mr. Phillpotts—I came from the back room into the bar-room when Orr and his son came in. I sat down and pulled on a pair of boots. I saw young Orr with his coat off. I first noticed him in his shirt sleeves, when Mackay went to give his coat to him.

Mr. Cameron then made an eloquent appeal to the jury on behalf of the prisoner, contending that the prisoner had only acted in self-defence.

After a brief address from Mr. Phillpotts on behalf of the prosecution, His Lordship delivered his charge to the jury. He read the whole of the evidence which had been adduced, and then said that the testimony was of the most conflicting character, and it was for the jury to determine which of the witnesses they were to believe. After explaining what constituted murder, manslaughter, and common assault, and upon what grounds they could bring in a verdict of acquittal, he said he would leave the case in their hands, as the law provided that they alone were the persons to decide whether the prisoner at the bar was guilty of the charge preferred against him or not.

The jury then retired and after being absent about half an hour, they brought in a verdict of "Manslaughter."

The prisoner, who is a man apparently between 40 and 50 years of age, was then removed from the bar; and the court adjourned till Monday.

The imp

Polignac 4d Regiment!

From the London Times.

We believe that the English nation may fairly be gratified by the appointment of Marshal Pelissier to the post of French Ambassador in London. The Emperor is said to have declared that he selected this distinguished soldier as a tribute of respect to the alliance, to the English people, and to the two armies. If the Duke of Malakoff does indeed come among us in a conciliatory spirit, he may make sure of being cordially received. This country has always paid especial attention to the representatives of its nearest neighbour and given them a sort of priority in the diplomatic body. Not only their high rank as Ambassadors, but their position as spokesmen of the French Government has been thought to entitle them to peculiar esteem. On personal grounds Marshal Pelissier has a claim to a respectful reception. He is, in dignity and public consideration, one of the first men in the Empire. He is a General of distinction, and commanded the French Army in the greatest military enterprise of our time. His fame and the title he bears were won in a campaign in which the armies of France and England fought side by side; and if the French Emperor desired to pay homage to the alliance between the two countries, he could not choose an Ambassador who would more effectively represent it to Europe. Although the diplomatic duties of the representatives of the two countries are much circumscribed by the proximity of the capitals and the ease with which the respective Governments communicate, yet there is no doubt that the presence of a man of station and authority in this country, who can judge for himself of the temper of the people, and the course of public opinion, must be of the greatest service to Europe. Owing to our national customs, our meetings and banquets, with their accompanying speeches, a foreign representative has many opportunities of forming an acquaintance with a world beyond the narrow official circle, and of addressing the nation to whose Court he is accredited. An Ambassador, entitled by his rank and abilities, to speak authoritatively in the name of his countrymen, may do much, by a popular and frank address, to preserve good feeling between powerful nations. We would, then, sincerely give the Duke of Malakoff a welcome to this country, and hope that his mission may be attended with a revival of that cordiality which has been compromised by recent events. Whatever may be the difference of the institutions of the two countries, they have interests which bid them keep on good terms with each other; and though we are not sanguine enough to believe that causes of irritation will not from time to time arise, still we are sure that the presence of a firm and sensible man as Abamador in London, will be a safeguard against any rupture of friendly relations.

In according to the new Ambassador a fitting welcome we ought not to allow M. de Persigny to quit his post without an acknowledgment of his services in the cause of the alliance. M. de Persigny is an old friend of the Emperor, attached to him before the advent of his wonderful fortunes, and, we believe, singularly zealous in his cause. But the late Ambassador was also acquainted with England, and knew the value of a free people's friendship and esteem. For several years he has represented France at the English Court; and it is but just to say that, while forwarding the interests of his own Sovereign, he had never forgotten what was due to the nation which has been the ally of France in a great war and in difficult negotiations. Of course it is not for the English people to discuss any official changes on which the French Government may resolve; but still M. de Persigny was so confessedly the supporter of the English alliance against certain other influences which are said to have existed that we may fairly express our recognition of his services, and our hope that nothing in the recent events will weaken the good feeling with which he has shown himself animated towards this country. It may certainly be a satisfaction to Englishmen that a statesman universally allowed to be disinterested and zealous in the Imperial cause has been the chief advocate of a friendly policy toward England, and we may legitimately draw the conclusion that the more that honest and manly counsels prevail in Paris the less chance will there be of any act or language which can rouse the resentment of our countrymen.

We may trust now that the dispute which has occupied the last two months is at an end. It has been of use to neither party, and has produced a bitterness which may well be regretted. Marshal Pelissier will arrive in London in time to see the English laws put in action against men who are charged with grave offences against the French Emperor. He will see justice administered without fear or favour, and he may be convinced that if the British nation had been properly appealed to the questions now to be tried might have been settled long ago, on any one of those occasions when, according to the French manifesto, evil-doers escaped with impunity. The French ambassador may be assured that any reasonable wishes which are expressed by a foreign power in a frank and conciliatory manner will meet with the consideration of the English nation, and that the practice of such open dealing will be far more effectual than any ambiguous note or menacing harangue.

On Thursday evening last, a singular sight was witnessed in New York: a torch light procession marched through the principle streets of that city, in honor of the man who lately attempted to assassinate Louis Napoleon. The members accompanying the procession are variously estimated at from 2,000 to 5,000, consisting principally of Germans, Italians, and Polish. Ten thousand people looked on in silence at the impressive spectacle—for impressive it was. Women walked in the ranks; fathers led their children by the hand; all seemed penetrated with the idea that they were discharging a solemn duty. When the procession got to the park, the scene changed. A number of speakers, in different languages, addressed the assembled multitude, speaking in the most intense bitterness of Paris, Orsini, and of Cinnamvlvan. Many Americans protested; others of the fairest classes did not appreciate their eloquence, though they frequently cheered them to "go it," and were particularly enthusiastic in the desire to "get him on this side of the water." The police, however, passed off more quietly than were expected, a considerable force being in attendance to suppress any disturbance.

The County Judge.

It will be very agreeable to the people of these Counties to hear that Mr. Macdonald's government has, after long consideration of the claims of the different applicants for the vacant judgship, accepted of Mr. Boucher. Although the rule of supplying offices from among those who are more immediately governed by them, accords better with popular sentiment, yet the promise of satisfaction arising out of the connexion with judge Boucher is so strong, that no complaint will be raised against Mr. Macdonald for his exercise of patronage in that quarter. We are quite sure that in welcoming judge Boucher to the bench of these Counties, we but express the general feeling; and, for all the approbation that attended its occupation by the late lamented judge Hall, there is every disposition to anticipate the same excellent qualifications in his successor; while, on the part of the judge, we are satisfied, every respect will be had for the interests of the parties submitted to his judgment, with a firm determination to retain in himself the high standing which he inherits from the office he assumes.

The Assizes.

Chief Justice Draper opened the Assizes on Tuesday afternoon. The address which he delivered to the Grand Jury was very appropriate and intelligible, and no doubt was productive of much advantage to all who then availed themselves of the opportunity of listening to a discourse from one of the most agreeable speakers the country has ever afforded. It is not alone upon the subject of the duties owing to each other from men living in society that Mr. Draper rises to perfection, he is, besides, a model of arrangement and style, continually endeavoring to satisfy and to please those he addresses; his language supplied without effort is exceedingly grateful in its organization, and his delivery is without a defect. No one who is capable of reflection can listen to him without attention, nor, attending, can he persuade himself that he is not in the presence of a great instructor. Not being in a position to preserve the address as it was delivered, we can only relate it in substance as the impression remains upon our memory. Mr. Draper commenced by congratulating the Grand Jury upon the peaceable state of the Counties, as was apparent by the lightness of the calendar. He drew attention to two charges, which stood in relief from among the rest, on account of their greater enormity, and the necessity there would be for more careful discrimination in the investigation of the evidence, which was ready to support them. They were the crimes of arson and manslaughter, beside which, all that remained on the calendar were comparatively light. After describing what constituted the crime of arson, he explained the extreme difficulty there always was found to exist in connecting the commission with the guilty party; there was the watchfulness suggested by the danger and fearful consequences of detection to make the incendiary seek the protection of concealment, together with the increased facilities supplied by modern invention, in the single instance of flame being produced suddenly by the use of artificial means, the result of science, as exemplified in the article of matches. So that one of the most beneficent applications of scientific research, as it is accepted in domestic comfort, is also capable of being converted, in the hands of evil disposed men, into one of the most destructive scourges that can be let loose upon society. Proceeding from the contemplation of this feature, Mr. Draper drew his audience to estimate the relative value of evidence which is positive, and that which is supported by a connection of circumstances all pointing to the same conclusion, in the case of a suspected party, and suggesting such an one as, were it really to occur, ought to produce a logical argument which would lead irresistibly to the conviction of his guilt. In the matter of manslaughter, the judge described the distinctions of homicide, from which proceed murder, manslaughter and the other descriptions the law gives to the crime of the slayer of men, according to the circumstances attending the cause of death. Passing to the crime of larceny, which the judge thought, from its unfortunately frequent commission, to be already well understood under its more ordinary term of stealing, he warned the Grand Jury of the duties and responsibilities of their office; directing them, especially, to be circumspect in their examination of the jail, so as they may be satisfied that humanity be not sacrificed, in the tolerably reciprocal to which the unhappy prisoners are subject. The judge however bore an earnest testimony to the uniform benevolence which attends the exercise of the callings of the sheriffs and their subordinates in this Province, and while he reaffirmed the Grand Jury of their charge in this respect, he expressed a firm conviction that in these Counties there could be nothing shown to mar the harmony of the present system.

The Steamers on the back lakes are moving out for business. The "Woodman" on Scugog Lake, is running. Mr. Wallis' "Ogemah," of Fenelon Falls, is making ready. Mr. Kelly's "Peterborough" is nearly ready, and Mr. Sawers' "Fly" makes her first trip to Bobcaygeon to-day. Mr. Wallis, Mr. Kelly, and Mr. Sawers, have each made great improvements upon their respective boats, and the public may expect to reap a large share of advantage from their outlay. Let us hope the public will will not be the only benefitters. The Locks at Bobcaygeon are completed, and the Locks at Lindsay will not be renewed this season; but all the necessary material will be delivered on the ground, and, next year, the wooden structure will give place to stone. The extent of navigation now open, from Port Perry on Scugog Lake to Bridgenorth on Mud Lake, is about seventy miles, and is a most agreeable tour for pleasure takers, and those who desire to form a correct estimate from personal observation of the back country. The steamer "Fly" will take up her quarters at Lindsay, running to Port Perry and back every second day, and to Mud Lake and back every alternate day. We have not heard of the arrangements made for the running of the other steamers. Mr. Thomas Bentland keeps the road communication open between Mud Lake and Peterborough by a line of stages and freight wagons. His office is at his livery stables, where the conveyance for passengers, parcels or freight can be obtained.

Blown Away.

About half-past four o'clock the military began to arrive. Gun after gun made its appearance and took up the position assigned to it. Out of every gateway from the fort, Europeans and soldiers were pouring on to the esplanade in hundreds, and from the native bazar every alley, street and lane were disgorging their thousands. All were anxious to behold two human beings blown away like dust. Death in such a form, and the stern and compressed lips of every European present told how well they deserved their doom. The

another point of view. It enabled the people to contain their trustees against acting too independently of them. The rashness of Captain Scott led him into a difficulty which was most painful to see him struggle to extricate himself from. He set himself up as an advocate of the people in their denouncement of those who had turned the property of the town to wrong account, talking a good deal of the treachery they had suffered. The tables, however, were soon turned, for Mr Sawers, after listening to the virtuous address of Capt. Scott, hinted that the Captain was not himself far enough removed from suspicion, to warrant his attack upon others, and asked the Captain if he too had not got the accommodation of a debenture. This was denied, but in such a manner as to leave the impression very clear that the denial was only a quibble. The explanation then given by Mr. Sawers as to the way in became aware of the circumstances was that Mr. Fowler had handed him a document to publish, which he described as a copy taken from a letter he had addressed to Mr. Conger and to which he could get no answer. Mr. Sawers told the meeting that he had not published it, because he did not wish to be drawing odium upon Mr. Conger and Capt. Scott, in the degree which must follow the publication of the document, but that now Captain Scott had set himself up as a model of purity, he would tell them that in that letter Mr. Fowler complained that Mr. Conger having obtained from him a debenture for the use of Captain Scott, upon the faith of his promise that Captain Scott should be true to his interests, and further that the Peterborough Review should echo his sentiments, whereas there was no dependence to be put in them as he learned from their subsequent conduct, he requested Mr. Conger to hand him back his debenture or the money. Mr. Conger, who spoke afterwards, did not contradict the statement, and the meeting felt that Captain Scott had played a very mean trick upon them. That people may judge of the truth of Mr. Sawers' statement regarding what was told him by Mr. Fowler, we here submit to them a copy of the letter as it has been furnished by Mr. Fowler:—

W. S. Conger, Esq.:

Dear Sir:—I am sorry to have to trouble you to return either the Debenture or the proceeds of it that I lent you for Scott's accommodation, you know I let you have it with the understanding that you would have Scott and the Review to assist me all they could in getting the branch completed. I think if you can look to the last two or three numbers of the Review, you will be satisfied that he is trying to injure me all he can, likewise, Mr. Scott, I am informed, at the Council Meeting last Monday night, tried all he could to keep the branch back, therefore, I have been very much disappointed, and demand the debenture or the proceeds forthwith.

Yours, Truly,
Signed, John Fowler.

The necessity of passing the By-Law was universally admitted, but of course those who came to blow off, had their opportunity. They did not however suggest any other course of action, nor did they show that the repudiation of the contract would not bring worse consequences upon the town. The people are not in good humor, but their good sense will keep them from biting their noses to spite their faces.

The Opening of the Road.

Mr. Fowler requests us to state that on some day next week two trains will arrive in Peterboro' over the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railway. The first to contain the Town Council, the Railroad directors and harbor commissioners of Port Hope, and their friends. The second train will be open to the Public as an excursion train. Mr. Fowler expects to have two locomotives and thirty car loads of passengers to enter the Town in a body. Those who entertain in such cases will do well to provide for the incursion of so unusual a body of men as will be let loose in our precincts on that day. The ladies will not be neglected on that occasion.

The Steamers on the back lakes are moving out for business. The "Woodman" on Scugog Lake, is running. Mr. Wallis' "Ogemah," of Fenelon Falls, is making ready. Mr. Kelly's "Peterborough" is nearly ready, and Mr. Sawers' "Fly" makes her first trip to Bobcaygeon to-day. manner in which they had been detected in their nefarious designs was soluble and complete, and reflected much credit upon the Deputy Commissioner of Police and his subordinates. Thugs though they be, a special Providence defeated the manœuvre by the timely arrival of European troops from remote colonies; and while the fourth plot was being brought to maturity, the two miscreants were seized. The Thugs demanded that a terrible example should be made and the doom of the men was speedy. As the hour of five o'clock approached became awful; every feeling and faculty was strung to its utmost tension, and the beating of heart became audible. The spectacle was one of quiet horror—there being none of that excitement which is to be met with at a public execution in any other part of the world. The natives of India are not a demonstrative race, and they looked on with an appearance of stolid indifference. The handful of stern and determined Europeans had, moreover, overawed them, and there was but one feeling predominant—fear.—Among all the assembled thousands a murmur could not even be heard—a whisper would almost have broken the stillness.—The officers rode along the lines resolved and silent. So noiseless was their motion that even the champ of their horses' bit and the clank of their sabres jarred upon the ear. While the clock was yet striking, the Brigadier commanding the garrison rode in front of the two executive guns, and it seemed for a moment as if all sound had died away. The sentence of the court-martial was then read to the prisoners in the Hindostanee language, after which they were ordered to prepare for death. They were stripped of their regimental jacket, and marched between files of their European guard to the muzzles of the two guns. The drill havildar, one of the two, was a noble-looking man, in the noon of manhood tall, and stately. His mein was erect and dignified, until the men of the Royal Artillery laid hands on him. Then he seemed to feel as if his hour had come, a shudder took his frame, his jaw fell, and his ivory-white teeth were disclosed. While the two men were being bound not a syllable was uttered by the assembled crowd, but a rattling of steel along the line gave notice that the Enfield rifle was being prepared for action. At the word "Prime" and when the ominous click of the lock fell upon the ear, the 10th N. I visibly shook. It was evident that they did not know but that the next moment the rifles might be brought to shoulder and levelled against their front. Simultaneously with the loading of the infantry the guns to the right and left of the criminals were turned straight upon the native regiments. They were loaded to the muzzle with canister and grape, and the gunners stood by the touch-holes with their matches lighted. On the ramparts of the fort four 68-pounders were also laid and ready. By this time the prisoners were secured to the two guns. There was a moment's pause, which was broken by Capt. Bolton, of the Royal Artillery, calling out with a loud voice,

"Let all retire from the two guns, except the two men with the port-fires; at the word 'fire,' apply the match."

There was probably a pause of two seconds' duration; when the word "Ready!" was given by Capt. Bolton. The gunners took but a moment to blow off their matches, but it seemed a long, long time.—The two prisoners and the two artillerymen stood as immovable as statues. The awful stillness was at length broken. The word "fire!" rang out clear as a clarion note from the lips of Capt. Bolton. Next moment the earth shook as if a volcano had opened at our feet. The guns were enveloped in thick clouds of smoke, through the white wreaths of which little particles of a crimson color were falling thick as snow-flakes. The particles were the prisoners blown into atoms.—Dickens' Household Words.

THE CAPTURE OF LUCKNOW.

SHIPWRECK OF AMERICAN VESSELS.

The steamship Canada, Captain, W. J. C. Lang, left Liverpool at 4 p. m., on Saturday, the 10th inst., and arrived at Halifax at 11 a. m., on Friday. The Canada sailed from Halifax at a quarter past two o'clock same afternoon for Boston, where she would be due at 11 o'clock that night.

The American bark Petrea, Captan S. Osborne, bound from Havre to New York, with 339 emigrants, which ran on shore near Chichester harbor, Sussex, on the morning of April 4th, had defied all efforts to get her off. The passengers and crew were all landed in safety.

The ship Weser of Hamburg, from New Orleans for Liverpool, was driven ashore in a gale off Malahide, near Dublin. The crew remained on board and the masts were standing at the latest dates, but the ship was embedded in the sand.

The ship Exchange of New York, Jones, from Liverpool to Newport, in ballast, went ashore at Wicklow, on the 5th inst., and was expected to become a total wreck. The crew were saved, with the exception of the second mate and cook.

The American bark Victor, Holmsend, from Callao to Dunkirk, was abandoned in a sinking condition in lat. 7, long. 32 west. The crew were saved.

The bark General Sale, from Sunderland to New York, put into Cork when 20 days out, in a leaky condition.

The ship Titan, Sears, of Boston, from Chincha for England, was abandoned at sea. The crew were picked up and taken to Havre.

Toronto Markets.

Thursday, 22nd April, 1858.

Throughout the past week the supplies of produce have been small, and with a dull market for flour, comparatively little business has been done. The weather has been varied, and on the whole unfavourable to the prosecution of spring work on the farm. The growing crop of fall wheat, however, has been benefitted by the rain, and its appearance is very cheering.

Flour—Inactivity has continued to be the main feature of the flour market.—The demand of export has been light, and at prices so low as to lead to but few transactions. Several holders have shipped to Montreal in the hope of realizing better prices. The amount at present on the market is small, yet to press sales a reduction would have to be submitted to. Since the receipt of the favourable news by the Arago there is a slightly better feeling, which, however, is not yet evinced in any improvement of value or demand. It is extremely difficult to fix quotations, and the following, although as near the mark as it is possible to arrive under the circumstances, must be regarded in a purely nominal light: Superfine, $3 75 to $3 90; Fancy, $4 to $4 05; Extra, $4 20 to $4 30; Double Extra, $4 50 to $4 75 per barrel. The shipments for the week are about 2,000 barrels, mainly to Montreal.

Wheat—The receipts throughout the week have been very light, and the business so insignificant that the market has hardly been tested. For good samples $1 has been freely paid, and occasionally a penny over is realized. For medium 90c to 95c (4s 6d a 4s 9d) are the ruling rates, and 80c a 85c (4s a 4s 3d) for inferior per bushel. There has been a good deal of anxiety manifested to secure good wheat by several buyers, yet the competition has not led to the payment of higher rates, and the market may be said to be in a very healthy condition—prices firm and steady and the demand active. The receipts for the week are slightly over 5000 bushels.

Spring Wheat is not so much sought after, but is still worth 75c to 80c (3s 9d to 4s) per bushel.

Oats—Supplies from farmers are very small, and the receipts are mainly composed of arrivals by the Great Western and Grand Trunk (West) Railways. The price now ranges from 30c to 32c (1s 6d to 1s 8d) per bushel.

Barley—The demand for barley is still active at 40c to 50c (2s to 2s 6d) for very choice samples, and 37½c to 40c (1s 10½d to 2s) for inferior and medium, per bushel.

Peas of good quality still move freely at 55½d @ 60c (2s 9d to 3s) for [illegible] and 50c to 55c (2s 6d to 2s 9d) for common use, per bushel.

Seeds—The demand for seeds is less active. Timothy $1 50 to $1 75 per bushel of 48 lbs, and clover at $4 50 to $5 per bushel at 60 lbs.

Potatoes are plentiful at various prices ranging from 50c to 70c (2s 6d to 3s 6d) per bushel according to quantity and quality. We echo large arrivals from Detroit, Rochester and other American ports.

Apples are plentiful at $2 25 to $2 50 per barrel and 5c to 6c per bushel.

Butter—Good fresh butter is scarce, and enquired for at 90c to 95c (1s to 1s 3d) per lb. Tub is in fair supply, but of good quality there is still a scarcity. We quote it at 10c to 12c (6d to 9d) per lb by the firkin for No. 1 to No. 2.

Eggs are very plentiful and prices continue low, ranging from 10c to 12½c (6d to 7½d) per dozen.

Poultry—The supply of [illegible] is almost equal to the demand, and the market is quiet at 5c to 6c per lb. for [illegible] one-third for chickens. There is nothing doing in [illegible].

Sheep are selling at $5 to $7 each.—Calves are in good supply from $2 to $5 each.

Pork is in more active request at 4½d per lb. Many [illegible] offer at 5c to 5½c per lb. [illegible] 5c to 5½c per lb.

NEW YORK MARKETS.

New York, April 21.

Flour—Market dull and, tendency downward. Sales 7,000 bbls at $4 15 a 4 20 for superfine State; $4 30 a 4 50 for extra do; $4 15 a 4 30 for superfine Western; $4 20 a 4 30 for common to medium extra Western. Canadian flour at moderate prices and unchanged; sales of 5,00 bbls at $4 20 at 4 35 for superfine, and $4 45 a 5 50 for extra Western.

Grain—Wheat in moderate demand; prices unchanged; sales of 15,000 bushels at 99c for Chicago spring and Canadian club, $1 35 for white Michigan, and $1 45 for white Kentucky. Rye quiet at 68c a 70c. Barley steady; sales at 62c a 64c. Corn dull; sales 10,000 bushels at 72c a 74c for white, and 76c for yellow. Oats plenty and dull at 46c a 50c for State, and 49c a 51c for Western.

Provisions—Pork firmer; sales 1500 bbls at $18 to 18 10 for mess; 14 50 a 14 90 for prime. Beef unchanged and firm; cut meats steady. Lard buoyant, sales 400 bbls at 11½c a 11½c. Butter steady at 12c a 17c for Ohio; 22c a 26c for new State. Cheese dull, at 7c a 9c Whiskey, sales 100 bbls., at 12.

Stock.—Rather better this morning but business not active. Chicago and Rock Island 76; Michigan Southern and Northern Indiana 25; Missouri 6's 83; Galena and Chicago 89½; Erie 26; Cleveland and Toledo 44½; Milwaukee and Mississippi 32; Hudson 41½; Harlem 12½; Reading 47½; Michigan guaranteed 49½; Erie bonds 75 28; do 65 44 Panama 109.

Money.—Exceeds the demand, at 6 a 6 per cent.

Sterling Exchange.—Nominal at 100.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Wednesday, May 5.

THE LOYAL ORANGE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to introduce a Bill to incorporate the Loyal Orange Association of Canada. He said the object of the Bill was not to incorporate the body as one large corporation. All they sought was that each individual lodge should be permitted to possess its real estate, and for that purpose to be incorporated. They asked no more than had been granted to other bodies. They had never as a body, in this House or out of it, taken it upon themselves to oppose such measures, because they were asked for by Roman Catholics or by any other denomination. They claimed this privilege because they conceived they had an equal right to it with others. Institutions quite as much of a religious character had been incorporated, and been incorporated with the sanction of the votes of Orangemen, as they considered that they were entitled to come before the Legislature and ask for the same privileges as had been granted to others. Had it been the object of the Bill to incorporate the Orange Association as a powerful political institution, he certainly would not have taken charge of it. It would not give permission for united action, but in case it passed it would leave the entire control of its own property to each section. For example, the Orangemen of Toronto would hold the property, on which their lodge-rooms were built, without being interfered with or controlled by the Orangemen of Hamilton or of any other section. All they asked was that each section of the body, living in a particular locality, should have permission to own a certain piece of land for the uses of the Society and for no other. He could assure the House that the Bill was not introduced with any view of exciting angry feelings or angry discussions, and he was sure that in any discussion which might arise in its progress through the House, he should not utter a word that could give offence to any. In introducing it, and simply explaining its nature, it was not necessary that he should enlarge on what the duties of the Orange Society were. He believed it was sufficiently well known, throughout the length and breadth of the Province, not to require any commendation on his part.

Mr. Dorion said that, if he believed the discussion of this Bill at its second reading, would be productive of any good, he would not object to its introduction. But as he felt certain that a large majority of the House would throw it out at the second reading, and that the mere discussion of it would be productive of angry feeling and of no good result, he conceived it to be his duty to oppose the introduction of the measure. He was not going to enquire what was the management of the Orange Society, or what were the feelings of its individual members. It was enough for them to know that the Society, from one cause or another, had created ill-feeling in the country. Moreover he believed that the recognition of the body by law, would have the immediate effect of causing contrary associations to come before the Legislature, also asking to be incorporated, and causing such an amount of ill-feeling among different classes of society, as would be productive almost of civil war. They knew that on several occasions in this Province collisions between classes of Irishmen, called Orangemen on the one hand, and Ribbonmen on the other, had caused loss of life. That of itself was a sufficient reason why they should not incorporate or legalize a body, the very existence of which was calculated to produce that ill-feeling. He did not say that the Orangemen were responsible for all the difficulties and all the quarrels that had arisen in this country, but there could be no doubt that it was to the existence of Orange Associations that they must attribute several of the conflicts which they had seen of late. And when they saw that in England, after the most careful enquiry into the circumstances, the Society had been condemned as calculated to excite ill-feeling between different classes, the subjects of Her Majesty, and that in Ireland, its birth-place, the Association had been formally condemned by the highest authority, he did not think they should do anything which would tend to encourage such a society in this country. If the application was to incorporate the Ribbonmen's Society, he would make the same motion—to throw such a Bill out. He thought it was the duty of every hon. member of this House, and of every good citizen in this community, to try to put down those societies, that had at least been the occasion of difficulties, which they had had often to deplore. Only a few days ago, they had a petition presented from a large number of the citizens of Toronto, complaining that injustice was being done them by the mere fact that Orangemen were upon juries. He did not say whether the petitioners were correct in this impression, but it at least showed that there was a great deal of ill-feeling on the part of one class towards the other, and this was sufficient ground why they should not encourage such an organization. He need not remind hon. members that hardly ten years had elapsed since a law was passed in this very House for preventing Orangemen and Orange Associations from having any processions. He did not wish to approve of that law, and probably had he been in the House at the time, he would have said it was giving too much importance to the Society to notice it in that way, and would have voted against the law. But he would not recognize them by an Act of Incorporation. And if the Legislature, but a few yearsago, thought the institution so dangerous that it passed a law to put down Orange processions, he considered they should not now pass a law to recognize and legalize them.

Mr. Patrick said it would be trusting the measure very discourteously to throw it out at its introduction. It was only fair that it should be printed, and that hon. members should have a chance of seeing what objectionable clauses were in it, if there were any such, in which case he would vote against it himself. But if it only contained, as its introducer stated, power to enable a lodge to hold real estate on which to build a lodge, and not to hold property for purposes of revenue, he really could not see that it was so very objectionable. He knew the Orange Association was very different from religious or literary societies—in fact it seemed to be more a political society than anything else, and on that account he was disposed to look upon it with jealousy. At the same time, they ought to treat with courtesy those who ask for the measure.

Mr. McGee thought that the reasons presented by his hon. colleague from Montreal were possessed of great weight, and were well deserving the consideration of the House. For his own part in one view, he was tempted to agree with the argument of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, that they ought to have the Bill printed, and to proceed in the usual way with a measure of this unusual character. Perhaps it might be useful to have the whole history of this Institution revealed authentically from the documents both of our own Parliament and of the Imperial Parliament, citing all that had been done in times past in relation to it. He conceived there might be a very great deal of good done to the public opinion of Canada, simply by this reproduction, for example, of the important points brought out in the blue-book of 1835, emanating from a very laborious Committee of the House of Commons, consisting entirely of natives of England and Scotland, with one exception, and all members of Protestant denominations, with the same exception—that of Mr. Shea. That Committee took four months to prepare their report. There were also some curious historical passages, which might not be a little edifying, if brought before the House and country. To bring to the discussion of a subject, which would be certain to attract the public attention, a good deal of information which had gone out of the common circulation of our time, and to place it again in circulation by the action of this House, might have a powerful effect on the public mind of this country. In this point of view, he might incline to the ground taken by the member for Grenville. But there was another view to be considered, and he must confess himself to be nearly equally divided in opinion between the two. It was quite certain that there were connected with this Institution associations—that there were connected with it memories—that there were connected with it facts, facts that had been sworn to in courts of justice, facts that had been the subject-matter of judicial sentences—that there were connected with it former acts of legislation, the reproduction of which would cause a great deal of excitement throughout this Province, and throughout the whole of British North America. He was sure that the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion, and the other hon. gentlemen who might sustain it, would bring to the discussion a tone and temper worthy of themselves, and worthy of this House. And for his own part, he thought he could say, although his memory was full of this subject, and although his heart was full of it, and although it was not to-day or yesterday that it had become to him a familiar subject, nevertheless he believed he could say that he could bring to its discussion, with his strong sense of what was due to this House, a temper which perhaps would not be unworthy of one who rose to discuss a great public question in this House. Still, he considered that such a discussion would be replete with danger. He held in his hand a synopsis of one of the blue-books to which he had referred, made by a Scotchman—and Scotchmen were said to be proverbially cool—from the Edinburgh Review, and he said it would be impossible at this day to publish the four pages of that synopsis, and circulate it generally through Western Canada, without creating a great deal of excitement, and recalling to the memories of settlers in this country, feelings which they would willingly have left behind them in the country from which they came, that in this new country they might live in peace and harmony with their neighbors. It would create a degree of excitement in the public mind, to which he, for one, did not desire to be a voluntary contributor. But, if it was the will of the House that the Bill should be received and printed, and come before them for discussion he was prepared fully to discuss it. From the year of its origin to this year, in every place where it had lifted itself, and in all its phases, political and social, he was prepared to discuss the history of the Orange Association then, or to discuss it now. But it was for hon. members to consider whether the good to be derived from a discussion of that kind would not be far more than outbalanced by the evil that would be done. And there was another point which he would suggest. If this were a new Society, organized this year or last year, and not a historical Institution, with the developements of which they were familiar, then there might be some reason for saying, "Print the Bill, and let us understand it." But the objectionable part of the Bill, to his mind, lay in its very title—"To Incorporate the Loyal Orange Association"—and there was no subject which had come before the Legislature this session, the very mention of which had caused so much excitement out of doors. Less than an hour ago, he had presented a petition from 2,900 inhabitants of Toronto against such a measure, and his hon. colleague had presented one from 4,600 inhabitants of Montreal of all denominations and origins. He believed he had himself presented twenty petitions on the subject within the last fortnight. If such was the effect of the thing being mentioned, what would be the effect if the assault of the last 170 years were recited—facts which a man of feeling and of heart could hardly, in his own closet, think over without deep emotion and indignation? During the whole of his public life, he had been a consistent enemy of all politico-religious secret associations; and if any one would show him any such which he could reach, he would be one of the first to bring his influence to bear against it—whether an organization of Ribbonmen, if there be such, or any other. Such ought to know that the end does not justify the means, however excellent the end which they might put before themselves. The only two occasions in his life that he had incurred personal danger, was in opposing secret political societies, of which some of his warmest friends had been the advocates. The member for Haldimand, who might be considered the Chief Remembrancer of the House, told him the other night that he had files of journals in which, when not an inhabitant of Canada, he (Mr. McGee) had contended against secret societies of a nature quite different from this—societies appealing to the patriotic feelings of the country in which he at that time resided. He believed the full discussion of the subject might do some good; but, at the same time, he saw the danger of inflaming the public mind, and of this movement leading to a counter-movement, and exciting a sectarian agitation out of door, than which, when once aroused nothing was more difficult to be allayed. On the whole, he thought the question was such that hon. members could make up their minds at once, and dispose of the Bill now, instead of submitting the country to the fearful ordeal of bringing up the whole history of this Association.

Mr. Notman did not understand what necessity there was for an application of this kind, since he had carried a measure himself to permit the incorporation of any charitable societies, so as to allow them to sue and be sued; to punish their officers who were guilty of malversation, &c.—However, he would like to see what the proposed Bill was, and would therefore vote for the first reading.

Mr. Dunkin—If he could consider this question as a matter of courtesy, would he be ready to vote for the first reading of the Bill? but if the question were raised at all on the first reading, it became the duty of members who thought they could not vote for the Bill in any shape, to vote at once against its introduction. He had no desire indeed to take part in legislation that would effect injuriously any body merely for belonging to a Society, whatever that might be; but he did not believe it was right that secret societies of a political or religious nature should have any aid or encouragement from the Legislature. While he did not wish to put such Societies down, he would decidedly refuse to do anything to build them up.

Mr. Daly supposed that the incorporation of this Society was not asked as a favour, but as a right due to the petitioners in common with all Her Majesty's subjects, to so many of whom similar acts of incorporation had been granted. The act of incorporation would not make the Orange Institution any stronger than it was, and it already numbered 80,000 persons.

Mr. Malcolm Cameron applauded the temper and talent shown by the hon. member for Montreal in speaking on this subject, and hoped the example he had set would be followed by other members who should afterwards address the House. But he did not think the country would be so much agitated, as that gentleman had thought, if this Bill were discussed, for these institutions had been long before the country, and their character and effect had been well understood. No person would be more ready than himself to express an opinion that there never ought to have been any such association in this country, and that its existence was calculated to raise feelings that should be for ever buried. He had never been ashamed to give his vote to put down party processions, but after years of discussion, that Bill had been repealed with the assent of a large majority of persons of an opposite creed to that which Orangemen professed. Since then, many other societies had been incorporated, both national societies and religious societies, and many of them had excited a great deal of prejudice, and had given an occasion for the employment of the arts of demagogues, who cared nothing for the country. He had long ago made up his mind to incorporate all these societies, so far as was required to enable them to sue and to be sued, and to hold land for occupation, and if the Bill went no farther than that, he would vote for it. He did not think there was much danger in that, for he had seen Orangemen and Catholics working together to pull down, and he could not see why they should not work together to build up.

Colonel Playfair was neither an Irishman nor an Orangeman, though he should not be ashamed to be either the one or the other. He had seen a good deal, however, of Orangemen from his youth. He had seen them in Ireland and had seen them walk there, and he had also seen them in regiments with Irish Catholics, where they agreed together and fought together. There were also 500 Orangemen in his county, who, on Sabbath morning, were to be seen riding to church alongside these Catholic neighbours and stabling their horses with them. The children of both classes were educated together, intermarried together, and lived happily together. All the Orangemen wanted was the same rights as other people, so that if they relieved a sick brother, they might have the means of compelling him—if necessary—to refund what had been advanced to him. The Orangemen were as loyal a people as any in Canada, and it would be a very hard thing to deny them this right.

Mr. Ferres said the object of seeking for this Bill was to be the incorporation not of a political, but of a charitable society.—The difficulty which arose about it merely proved the urgent necessity which existed for a general law which would enable all such bodies to incorporate themselves without special acts. He regarded the society, however, as really a political one; and whether the character it had acquired in some quarters was just or not—it was not for him to say—it was plain that if the House incorporated the Orange Society it must do the same thing for others of a diametrically opposite character, and being entirely opposed to anything of the sort he could not vote for the first reading of the present bill. He should, notwithstanding, be glad to see a general law under which all benevolent societies should be incorporated.

Mr. Talbot would vote for the Bill believing that the Orange Society would be found to be of a purely defensive character and calculated to promote civil and religious liberty.

Mr. W. Powell (Carleton) was glad to see that the principles of Orangeism were better appreciated as they became better known. The hon. member for Lambton, though avowing that he had at one time voted for penal legislation had confessed that he was not prepared to repeat the same thing now. For his own part he had incurred much contumely, because he had been a party to the incorporation of the ladies of Loretto; but he had done so, because those ladies were devoted to charitable works, and if they had some peculiarities—such as vows of celibacy,—the hon. member for Toronto was a celibate too. The Legislature, however, had granted acts of incorporation to these ladies, to the Odd Fellows, and to the Sons of Temperance, and would not he supposed refuse to incorporate the Free Masons. It had also incorporated societies which were objectionable to some persons like the Christian Brothers; and for his own part he had always been ready to grant these privileges to all alike. The Orange Society was not a political organization, except in so far as it required allegiance to the Crown as a requisite for membership. Their obligation was to assist one another, and their rules had been submitted to the public time and again. It might be insinuated, indeed, by the member for Montreal that in the course of his extensive reading he had met with something horrible done by the Orangemen; but the same thing might be said of many religious societies and even of religion itself. The hon. member also contended that it was a good ground of charge against the Society that a petition had been presented alleging that Orangemen, as a consequence of their organization had prevented the one course of justice in certain cases; but he might turn this argument against the Catholic religion since a petition had been presented declaring that the due course of justice was obstructed by Catholics in the case of the Corrigan murder, through their religious prejudices. He doubted whether the incorporation of the Orangemen would make them any stronger, and believed that the more secret they were the more powerful they must be, and as the friend of the Society he might vote against the Bill; but he should vote for it because it was asked for by 80,000 people as loyal and respectable as any in the Province. It was no more just to impute to the body the offences of men, who did not belong to it, but who retained its name, than to impute to the Churches the offences committed by persons who were disowned by them.

Hon. Mr. Drummond conceived that the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska had put this matter on its true footing. The House had nothing to do with the history of the Orange Society, but had simply to consider whether the Legislature should sanction the presence of a secret Society in the midst of the community. The question was whether the soul of all constitutional government was not publicity, and whether any attempts to control the course of government by underhand means should not be frowned down. He had the less hesitation in voting against this first reading, because no one could suspect that he was actuated by prejudice, since he had voted for the repeal of the processions Act, and had met with much opposition in his own County on the consequence of doing so. He had not, however, shrunk from the charge, but had declared that if the thing was to be done again he would be ready to do it. He would not legislate against these Societies then, but he would never sanction them. Besides, he wished to avoid any of the turmoils which arose from persons brought from another country. He had always desired in Canada to live in hope rather than in memory, and to improve the condition of the people here by forgetting the disputes which had occasioned them so much misery in the land from whence they came.

Mr. Short could not forget that the body which it was proposed to incorporate formed a large proportion of the people of the country, who had a right to equal advantages with the others. It was said that the discussion of this measure might cause excitement; but it was also to be remembered that excitement might be caused by the extraordinary course of throwing out the Bill upon its first reading.

Mr. Gould also considered it a question whether it would not excite more feeling to throw this Bill out at once than to let it be read and discussed in the ordinary way. He agreed with the hon. member for Shefford on the impropriety of incorporating secret societies, and if none had been incorporated heretofore he would go with the hon. member against the present Bill; but there were other secret societies; corporated, and the one now proposed might be regarded as a sett-off against them. The Orangemen had, he thought, little to gain by incorporation. The body was greatly on the increase—an augmentation which he believed was due to certain proceedings in Lower Canada. In his Riding they had almost all voted against him; both the Orangemen and the Catholics acting together for Mr. Gowan; but notwithstanding that he thought it would be an act of great injustice not to let their Bill be brought forward; and if any important facts relating to the Society could be brought forward by the hon. member for Montreal, the country would have the benefit of the discussion.

Mr. Brown agreed with the hon. member for Shefford that the member for Arthabaska had chosen the proper ground on which to place the discussion. The true question was whether the Bill should be passed as a measure of public policy, as a measure calculated to promote the benefit of society. But he thought the hon. member would have done well if he had taken this ground long ago, and had refused to incorporate the Jesuits and the hundreds of other Roman Catholic corporations, all with power to hold real estate, and specially framed to accumulate power in the hands of the hierarchy of the Church of Rome.

Mr. Drummond asked if there was any not to incorporate the Jesuits?

Mr. Brown said of course there was—the Jesuit's College in Montreal. (Laughter on the Ministerial side of the House.) Hon. gentlemen might laugh; but it was not to be denied that the Corporators of that Institution were the Jesuit society—that it was an avowed nursery of Jesuitism, and that it yearly received large support from the public chest. He (Mr. B.) was not an Orangeman, and had always thought it a subject of deep regret that the harsh associations connected with the institution as between Catholics and Protestants, had been transferred from Ireland to this country; but the existence of the Society in our midst was a great fact, and thousands of excellent citizens were in its ranks. It was a very discourteous step to throw out the Bill at the first reading, although such a course was sometimes adopted. If hon. members were prepared to say that these petitions were not entitled even to a hearing, it was certainly open to them to act in the summary way proposed. But if Orangemen are associated, not only for political, but also for benevolent purposes—if this Bill was merely to recognize them in their benevolent capacity, and to give them power to accumulate funds for the support of the wives and children of deceased Orangemen—and if there was a clause to prevent them from holding real estate, except for use and occupation—then he did not see why the Bill should be treated differently from other Acts. He frankly confessed his opinion that the influence of the Orange body on the politics of this country, in past years, has not been for good; but a change had recently showed itself, and he hoped there were to be no more such scenes witnessed as Canada. But, however that might be, the House could not permit the statute-books to be filled with Acts for the incorporation of all sorts of Roman Catholic institutions, and all sorts of secret societies, many of them drawing money from the public chest, and at the same time, refuse the present demand. Again, if this Society was taken out from all others, and refused that which all others obtained, the effect would be to rally round it men who had now no sympathy with it. Admitting all the evil that could possibly be alleged against the Society, there was nothing in it that equalled the evils of those ecclesiastical institutions against the incorporation of which he had always striven, but which the House had persisted in legalizing by hundreds. For one, he was bound to say, moreover, that he had carefully read the constitution of the Orange body and its proceedings for several years past, and he defied any man to read those documents and to find one word to which he could object in the slightest degree. If evil had grown out of the institution, it did not arise from its principles, but from the abuse of them; and if the House adopted the rule that they must refuse to incorporate any institution whose object had been abused, it would have to dismiss a great many more than it had been in the habit of doing. He should vote for the first reading, and so far as he understood the Bill at present, for the second reading also.

Hon. Mr. Cauchon would vote against all incorporation of secret societies. He would vote against ribbonmen, just as he would vote against this, and the stand he took the other day on the Catholic petition showed he was not improperly influenced by religious feeling. It was all very well to say that the Jesuit's College was a secret society; but it would have been just as absurd for him to say that Knox's College was a secret society. People were induced to vote for or against this Bill, in proportion as they were supported or opposed by the Orangemen. For his own part he was free from prejudices, having only one man in his County of British origin.

Hon. Mr. Allevn would vote for the first reading of the Bill. He did not think his mind would be altered by anything he should hear; but he was of opinion that everything ought to be fairly discussed.

Mr. R. Scott was of a contrary opinion. The hon. member for Toronto compared this society with certain corporations in Lower Canada; but really there was no comparison between them. He thought the discussion of this measure would do harm, and as a Canadian anxious to have a national feeling in the country would oppose all institutions of foreign origin.

Mr. Burton believed that there was no excitement whatever in the country in reference to this matter. Many Orangemen, he was convinced, were opposed to it, and he had been asked to oppose it from all those in his own part of the country. He should do so in every stage.

Mr. Sherwood desired to see every Bill discussed before it was rejected, and would therefore vote for the first reading.

Mr. Hogan was of opinion, that considering the tenderness shown to and the encouragement given to other corporations—to the St. Michael's College, the Christian Brethren, and others—it would be very wrong to refuse incorporation to this society. Considering that the Postmaster-General, the Attorney-General, and many other members of the House were Orangemen he would not stigmatize them by throwing out this Bill on the first reading. As to excitement, the hon. member for Montreal had discussed the matter with great eloquence in the New Era and in Parliament; but he had never heard that those discussions had led to any lawless act.

Mr. McGee reminded Mr. Hogan of the events of the 17th March.

Mr. Hogan did not believe that those events had been caused by any particular discussions, but thought they were caused from the combinations of men who would have made the same kind of rows with or without any discussion. He should, therefore, vote for the Bill on the first reading; but at the same time he would be candid enough to say that he did not expect to vote for the second reading.

Atty. Gen. Cartier did not at present know that there was any intention to incorporate any secret society by this Bill; for his own acquaintance of anything of that kind nor did he know that there were any Orangemen in the House; but he presumed there might be some. However that might be, he found the Orangemen most ready to support every Catholic institution; and they gave their votes to the Separate Schools especially. Besides the members for Montreal and Shefford had not voted against the reading of this Bill when brought in by Mr. Cameron last year.

Mr. Dorion said that there had been no division on the Bill, and he did not know that he had been in the House at the time.

Atty. Gen. Cartier would not promise to vote for the second reading of the Bill, but though he was opposed to all secret societies, yet as he could not tell that this was a secret society, and thought, perhaps, the member for North Hastings might do away with that feature of the institution, he would not reject it on the first reading.

Hon. Mr. Drummond asked what was the use of giving the House the trouble of hunting this measure up again, when he said he was resolved to vote against it.

Atty. Gen. Cartier said that he had already stated that he did not know the Bill was intended to incorporate any secret society at all.

Mr. Dorion said that he wanted to explain that if he had not voted against the incorporation of this society in the session of 1846, it was perhaps because he was not present. He did not recollect of the matter. At any rate it would be seen by the Government that his opinion would be just what it was now, inasmuch as he had voted with Mr. Laberge in favour of preventing any secret societies from being incorporated under the general bill introduced by Mr. Drummond. He also wanted to explain that there was no discourtesy—nothing at all unusual in moving the six months hoist on the first reading, it might not be very common in Canada, but in England it was done two or three times every session. He instanced the case of the Conspiracy Bill.

Atty. Gen. Macdonald attempted to show from the Journals that Mr. Dorion was in the House a very short time after the Orange Incorporation Bill of Hon. John H. Cameron was read a first time, and, therefore, he was probably there at the time. He went on to say that he should act on this measure as he had done on all others—he should vote in favor of incorporating every society having a harmless or legal purpose. And having been a member of the Orange body since 1841 or 1842, he could say from his experience, that there was nothing in that association, in its principles or practices, which should cause it to receive the disapprobation of any honorable or liberal minded man.

Hon. Mr. Alleyn believed the best way to increase the influence of the Orange Society would be to oppose it improperly. When the matter was fairly discussed at the second reading, the whole subject would be properly handled, and the public would have an opportunity of forming an opinion on the merits of the question. But, if they threw out the Bill at its first reading, he believed the result would be a great increase to the Orange Lodges during the next month. Why did not the member for Shefford make the speech he had done today, when the Bill was introduced two years ago? The hon. gentleman was then a member of the Government, and leader of the House for Lower Canada, and it was his duty, if the Bill was so very obnoxious that it required to be thrown out at the first reading, to have taken up that ground then. He (Mr. Alleyn) would be pleased if this Society was allowed to die a natural death, which he considered it could do, if not brought into undue prominence by agitation.

Hon. Mr. Terrill believed that no good would result from this measure—he was opposed to it in principle, and he should vote against its introduction.

Mr. Foley thought the course pursued by his hon. friend from Montreal was more manly and straightforward than that of the Attorney General East and the Commissioner of Public Works. His hon. friend said he was opposed to the measure and should oppose it from the outset. Those other hon. gentlemen, while supporting the introduction of the Bill, intimated that they would throw it out at the second reading. Equally hostile to the measure they kept the promise to the ear and broke it to the hope. It was like inviting a person into your house for the purpose of kicking him out, after getting him in. It had been denied that the Orange Society was a political institution. He held that the annals of the last election showed that they were more a political institution than anything else.

Hon. S. Smith—How so? How was the member for Toronto elected?

Mr. Foley—The member for Toronto can speak for himself, but we know what resolutions were passed by Orange Lodges, to secure the return of Brother Sidney Smith.

Mr. McGee read a resolution adopted by an Orange Lodge, at Cobourg, to the effect that they had every confidence in Brother Sidney Smith, as he has pledged himself to support an Act for the incorporation of the Loyal Orange Association."—(Hear, hear.)

Mr. Foley.—Is the hon. gentleman satisfied?

Hon. S. Smith—I am satisfied that the Orangemen made a great mistake when they voted for any member of the Opposition.

Mr. Foley said he had another evidence that the Orange body was a political association, in resolutions passed by a Lodge, expressing confidence in the Government, because Brother John A. Macdonald was at the head of it. Further evidence was furnished that on the very eve of an election did the Sons of Orangemen bases on the eyes of the Postmaster General. He had lived all his life in a district where the Orangemen were a strong body, and they have been well acquainted with their politicians, but the hon. gentleman never did it to his duty to join them, until it became a matter of importance to him to secure the Orange vote. The evidence was abundant that this Institution had endeavoured to exercise a political influence, which, however, was exercised occasionally in favour of one party, and occasionally in favour of another, for the purpose, not of carrying out the benevolent objects of the Institution, but for securing to themselves a political power which in no other way they could acquire. They had been told of the liberal support given by Catholics to Orangemen in various constituencies, but could any one point out a single instance, where that liberality had been reciprocated, where a Roman Catholic, having been set up in an Orange constituency, received the support of the great body of the Orange or Conservative party?

Mr. Powell.—The member for Ottawa, Mr. Scott, a Roman Catholic, received the votes of a Deputy Grand Master, and many other influential Orangemen.

Mr. Allevn—I received the votes of many Orangemen.

Sol. Gen. Rose—In Montreal the Attorney General East was supported by a majority of the Protestants and Orangemen.

Mr. Robinson—I was proposed by the Orange Grand Master of the District, and received the support of many influential Roman Catholics.

Mr Foley said that in places where the Catholic element largely predominated, the Orangemen might support the dominant party, precisely as they did in this House, for the purpose of obtaining that power and influence which the strength of their own principles could not obtain for them. But he denied that there was any real Catholic candidate had been chosen owing to the boasted liberality of the Orangemen. Except perhaps one, where representations were made to the Catholics that it was all important to have a Catholic candidate, he supposed to keep him (Mr. Foley) out. If there were other constituencies where the same thing had happened it was done in order to prevail upon members of the catholic church to leave those with whom they had hitherto united. But take strong conservative constituencies, where the conservatives could elect who they please—take such constituencies as Frontenac or Kingston, where, if sincere, the conservatives could elect whom they pleased, and he asked whether in such places there was any attempt to reciprocate this good will, which Protestants from Lower Canada boasted that they received from the hands of their catholic neighbours. Yet if that was not done, it was certainly not because it was not put to the conservatives, and that very strongly, that they ought to show their good will by returning three or four catholics. It has been contended that this Bill should be passed because other objectionable societies had been incorporated; but he could not understand how the incorporation of one political society was to be cured by the incorporation of others.

Mr. Brown said that was not the argument. What he had urged was that the objection to the incorporation of this Society came with a very bad grace from those who had hitherto incorporated so many secret societies of quite as objectionable a character.

Mr. Foley admitted the truth of Mr. Brown's argument, but did not see that even that was conclusive in favor of the bill. Indeed, he would vote against it, if for no other reason because he believed it would be injurious to the Orangemen themselves. Here was a society said to number 80,000 members, who were already too much under the control of a central power, and that control would be rendered still more complete if the present Act of incorporation were passed. It would give powers to the managing bodies inconsistent with the rights of individual members. The power of saying for does was of itself one that might be exercised with great effect, at particular crises. All such institutions were really directed by some bold ambitious men. The governing body in this case was well known, and it was also known that great complaints were already made of its proceedings. There was no unanimity in the desire for the Act of incorporation among the Orangemen themselves. The statements made by the member for Durham and others, showed that there was a large body of them who did not desire that the bill should pass. He believed even that the hon. member for North Hastings himself, if he had his own way, would not be favourable to it, while nine-tenths of those not connected with the order would be opposed to giving further powers to the society, so as to put it in a position to coerce others.

Hon. S. Smith declared himself proud of being an Orangeman, and hoped the members of the Orange Society would remember the conduct of the member for Waterloo.

Mr. Foley—I am not afraid of them.

Hon. S. Smith—Well, the hon. member for Waterloo might not be afraid of them; but at least he might remember that the majority of the gentlemen who surrounded him owed their position to Orange votes. (Cries of "no.") Well, he supposed the hon. member for East Brant owed his seat to Orange votes.

Mr. Christie said no.

Hon. S. Smith—Well, the hon. gentleman who sat beside him did.

Cries of "no."

Mr. Brown—I do.

Other Gentlemen—And I, and I.

Hon. S. Smith—Well, he wished it to be known that the Orange Society could not be much mistaken, since there were only three members of the Opposition who would admit that they were elected by Orange votes.

Mr. Hartman and Mr. Sidney rose to call the hon. gentleman to order. It was most unfair to represent gentlemen as rejoicing the confidence of Orangemen when they had made no such statement. It was not because gentlemen had remained silent that they acquiesced in what he said.

Hon. S. Smith would admit that there were more members of the Opposition who owed their seats to Orangemen, than that, unanimously, seven members of the Opposition who owed their seats to Orangemen. Well, then he could point to many members on the side of the House who were elected by the same influences. If they were so, the Society was ordinarily not political, at any rate, not a party Society, and therefore could not be charged with that it was formed primarily that it might [illegible] Parliament, every vote affecting the politics was watched by Orange [illegible] Take the bill to incorporate the Ladies of Loretto, and it would be found that every Orangeman in the House voted for the bill. Here Mr. S. Smith read the votes which had been given for the incorporation of the Ladies of Loretto, and among these votes was found the hon. member for Waterloo. The hon. member was not afraid of Orangemen—he hoped the Orangemen would take a note of that—but while the hon. member was prepared to vote against the incorporation of Orangemen, he had no objection to vote for the incorporation of the Ladies of Loretto. He declared again that the Society was not a political one.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said that so had the people of Grillintown passed resolutions in his (Mr. McGee's) favour. No political subject was ever taken up in Lodge; but the members of the Lodges might of course hold meetings, and pass resolutions, each voting according to his own judgment. He was prepared also to tell the hon. member for Shefford that the Orange society was not a secret society. He had been a member of the Odd Fellows' society, and he could declare that the Orange institution was no more a secret society than the Odd Fellowes' society, and his brother Notman knew that there was nothing really secret in that. There was another society which was a secret one, and to that his brother Foley and his brother Macdonald of Cornwall belonged. He called on members of the House to recollect that the Orange society was composed of persons as respectable, as loyal, and as liberal as any other persons whatever, and he did ask that when these persons applied for an Act of Incorporation in a quiet proper way, whether they should be exposed to the insulting terms which had been used by the member for Waterloo when he spoke of them as humbug. At this stage he only contended for the right of every class of the community to come to that House for an Act of Incorporation; but on a future occasion he should be quite ready to vote for the second reading of the bill, though he would of course oppose any Act of Incorporation to give the parties the right to hold land for revenue purposes.

Sol. Gen. ROSS regretted the very unusual course which the hon. member for Montreal had taken. It was so unusual a course that in England for fifteen years past, only thirteen bills had been refused a first reading, including Mr. Berkeley's annual bill on the ballot. In this House, since 1852, there had been but two bills rejected on first readings. He wanted to see the names of Orangeism and Ribbonism both disappear—he wanted to see the end of quarrels of another age and country; but this unprecedented course of the hon. member for Montreal was the best possible way to keep up these feelings. He disapproved of this society,—he would vote for any measure to discourage it—but he thought the present amendment the very way to give new strength to it. It was certainly a most discourteous thing to treat this request of 80,000 persons, in the manner at present proposed; and he could not but contrast the course taken by the senior member for Montreal, who gave no reasons for the course he had taken, with the quiet, temperate remarks of the junior member for Montreal, who seemed to hesitate to follow his leader, though he had declared that he came into Parliament only to put down Orangemen.

Mr. McGee said he had done nothing of the sort.

Sol. Gen. ROSS confessed that he had gone a little to far. He believed that all that the hon. member said was, that he would oppose a Government which was maintained by Orange influences. He (Mr. R.) however was determined to vote against the second reading. (Laughter and cries of "oh, oh.")

Mr. FOLEY—Why do you vote for the first reading?

Sol. Gen. ROSS—Why, I do not know what the bill is yet. It may be a blank piece of paper.

Mr. FOLEY—Then how do you know you are going to vote against it?

Sol. Gen. ROSS concluded by declaring that Mr. Dorion, in making his motion an amendment, was only attempting to make political capital, and that he believed he would discover at last that he gained nothing by it.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD believed that the hon. Solicitor General West had gained a great lesson from the first bill which he had brought in. He had only brought in one Government bill yet, and that was now in such a position that it would never come up again. The hon. member, however, was carrying out the policy of his colleagues by voting for the first reading to please the Orangemen, and then throwing it out on the second reading to oblige the Catholics. He thought that the present bill would be treated exactly like the Usury Law bill, which it was very well understood would never appear again in the same shape. The Solicitor General had expressed great surprise at the amendment of the hon. member for Montreal. In a few years he would probably find more things in the Legislature to surprise him; but he (Mr. Macdonald) thought that the House might well be surprised at the bill which had been introduced. This society had long existed in Ireland and England, but no one had ever yet dared to apply for an Act of Incorporation in that country. In New Brunswick such a bill had once been introduced, but in the course of its passage through the Legislature, the Attorney General had risen and had stated that if it passed he would advise the Crown to refuse its assent. Why then was this measure to be introduced here when the society was considered elsewhere of such a nature, as to be thought, if not illegal, at least to be frowned down.

Mr. BENJAMIN—It cannot be frowned down here.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD—Why your own friends tell you that they will vote down the bill on the second reading. That was stated just now by the Sol. General; and what is that but to frown the society down?

Sol. Gen. ROSS had not said he would vote against the bill; but that if it was of a nature such as described by its opponents, he would vote against it. He had said that for all he knew the bill was a blank sheet of paper.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD would ask the Commissioner for Public Works, (Mr. Allen,) if he meant to say that he did not understand what were the rules and constitutions of this society.

Mr. ALLEN did not allege that he was ignorant of them.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD then asked why it was that the Ministry, some of whom acknowledged that they were not ignorant of the nature of the bill, should vote for the first reading of the measure, only to destroy it at a subsequent stage. It was said that the Orange Society was not a political one; but the first one that sought to petition there discussed in Lodge, the Lodge was to concur even then the Master came down from his chair, and a political meeting was held, and a vote taken on the question as to be supported. That was what was done by the Cobourg Lodge, which had passed the resolutions in favour of the Postmaster General. He did not think that the time of the House should be wasted out of deference to the member for North Hastings; but that, as the bill was to be rejected, it would be more worthy of the position of members of the Government to say so at once.

Hon. Mr. SICOTTE without pledging himself to vote for the second reading of the bill, would vote for the first, because he considered it an unusual course to reject any measure on the first reading, especially a private bill, of which no one could at present know the contents.

Mr. GALT said that the first reading of the bill would affirm its principle. It was different from an ordinary private bill, and if they permitted the bill to be introduced they admitted the principle of the propriety of legislating in favour of secret societies. He thought it would be dangerous to admit any such principle. If they granted this incorporation, they would have other secret political societies of an antagonistic character, also coming for recognition, and a state of feeling would be excited, which could not easily be allayed.

Mr. TURCOTTE was sorry to do anything that might be deemed discourteous by his hon. friend from Hastings; but there were strong reasons why this bill should not even get a first reading. The Attorney General East said he was against the principle of this bill.

Mr. TURCOTTE—Well, every one knew that this was a secret society.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER—We don't know it.

Mr. TURCOTTE—The thing is quite notorious.

Mr. McGEE said that Mr. Daly and Mr. Powell, who avowed themselves Orangemen, both spoke of the secrets of the order.

Mr. TURCOTTE went on to say that every one knew that the Orange Association was a secret society, and being opposed to all such societies, he considered it his duty to vote against the bill from the very outset.

Hon. Mr. LORANGER was of opinion that no private bill should ever be rejected on the first reading, and he declared that no case could ever be found in which such a bill had been rejected.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD said he could find a dozen cases and mentioned two bills, one of which was a Bank bill, both of which however,

Mr. LORANGER declared, were outside of the true definition of a private bill, the Bank bill giving special power to a corporation different from those of the rest of her Majesty's subjects. At present he knew not what the bill was, and would therefore not reject it. The bill might even do away with the secrecy of the Orange society, but if it turned out to be a bill to incorporate a secret society he would vote against it.

Mr. AIKENS said he for one, as a member of the Opposition, had received the Orange vote in his county, all that was asked for by this bill was simply corporate powers, by which each Lodge could hold its own necessary property. The same power was granted to Sons of Temperance and other bodies. As to its secrecy, he believed the Orange body was a secret association as regarded signs and pass-words, but he had read their constitution and rules, and saw in these nothing that was objectionable. He should vote for the first reading, and also for the second reading, if the bill contained nothing more objectionable than yet appeared.

Mr. ROBINSON doubted whether a bill for the incorporation of any society, secret or otherwise, had ever been resisted on its introduction, and he did not think any hon. members were justified in opposing the introduction of this bill. The member for Montreal objected to this bill because the Association was a secret one. And shortly afterwards he read a resolution of one of the Lodges, moved by Mr. Thompson, seconded by Mr. Jones, and resolved that Mr. Smith was a fit and proper person. Was that a proof of secrecy?

Mr. McGEE said that, annexed to the resolution was a statement that after being in secret session for an hour, so and so was announced as their decision.

Mr. MORIN desired the bill to be read.

The SPEAKER stated that this could not be done, as the bill was not yet formally in possession of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not a member of the Orange Society, but thirty years ago he owed his election to this House to many noble members of that order. No difficulty had been caused by them in this country till Mr. Gowan came and introduced a deal of trouble, some 28 years ago. Since that period much ill-feeling had arisen from Orangeism. He could toast the glorious and immortal memory as well as another. But what fools men were to quarrel and even lose their limbs or their lives about a battle fought two hundred years ago! The Orange Society was a political association. They had two Governors in Canada—one at the big flag staff and the other down at the goal. The Governor at the gaol was to decided whether John Sheridan Hogan or William Lyon Mackenzie should be the candidate for the county of Grey. In a document which he held in his hand it was proclaimed that in such cases "reference must be had to the Right Worshipful Grand Master and Sovereign." And who was this Right Worshipful? The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Benjamin) used to be, but he was a Past Grand Master, and now he had to go to the turnkey at the gaol and go down on bended knees and ask whether he or Mr. Hogan should be elected to represent Grey! Not for Orange Society would be ever vote for in Canada. He would vote for nothing that would make men hate each other for the sake of God. The Attorney General said he joined the body in 1841. What was there in Orangeism then to make him join it? He might have seen murder stalking through the streets of Toronto. He might have seen Commissioners in this city trying to find out the cause of the cruel and barbarous murders when Mr. Dunn and Mr. Beaubien were elected for this city. The hon. gentleman found it convenient to fish in those troubled waters, and, as in 1841, he joined the Orange Society. This was a secret Society, but the people got at some of their secrets, when they quarrelled with each other. Here was an article by Right Worshipful Gowan in 1853, headed "The Bellerville Pope." (Laughter.) This Bellerville Pope was the honorable gentleman who introduced this Bill. "Had we not seen the following extract issued by his Holiness the Pope of Belleville, we could not have believed that any man could have issued such a piece of wickedness, hoarheat, and folly." Think of incorporating together Orangemen who could talk that way of each other. Why, they would scratch each other's eyes out. "And yet the bellying fool"—how polite those Right Worshipfuls were to each other! Mr. Mackenzie proceeded to read a proclamation of William the Fourth, and the sentence of Lord Norbury and other distinguished Orangemen against the Orange Association. He should vote against the first reading of the bill.

he should do so, even if it should cause his being put out of public life—and notwithstanding the threat held out by the Postmaster General to the member for Waterloo. He did not blame the Orangemen for the evils which arose from the institution, but he blamed the artful politicians who worked themselves into their confidence for purposes of their own. The principles of the Orange body were very good, and they were often perverted for the worst purposes. The Government had paid $17,000 to a couple of renegades in Huron to advance their interests in that quarter, and one of them, as Master of a Lodge, issued his order for all Orangemen to vote for Mr. Cayley, and then said—"I would conclude by urging you, as you value the rights and privileges of our glorious Order, to rally, to a man, to the support of that Government which has for its head a true Orangeman, John A. Macdonald." The Postmaster General said the Orangemen made a great mistake when they voted for any member of the Opposition. But was not the hon. member a rat? Did he not remember the time, not long ago, when the honorable gentleman was with him in Opposition? He remained in Opposition till he got a bone to pick on the other side, and having gone over there, as a Grand Master, or whatever else they had made of him, he declared there was not a man of his old friends of the Opposition whom he would have seen in the House, had he got his way.

Mr. FERGUSON said the hon. member for Haldimand had shown how Grand Masters had quarrelled. But other men were disposed to quarrel. Had not Mr. Mackenzie quarrelled with his old friends? Had he not said that he would not believe Dr. Rolph on oath? The hon. member had misrepresented the Orange body sum total (sic.) He attacked Ogle R. Gowan as having introduced strife. And what had made Mr. Gowan odious? Because some thought he was too conciliatory, in regard to Roman Catholic institutions, because he had a friendly feeling for all, and wished to give the people of another religion facilities for carrying on benevolent operations. Yet this was the man whom the hon. member attacked as intolerant and as the introducer of strife into the Province. Mr. Ferguson proceeded to read from the constitution of the Orange Society, to show that the obligation of an Orangeman required him to manifest charity and good-will to all men, and to be a good member of society. He had here all the books of the Association, and was willing to place them in the hands of any Roman Catholic, assured that he would find nothing which showed that Orangeism in the least degree encouraged intolerance and bigotry. There were 10,000 Orangemen in Upper Canada. Taking in their friends and connections, they numbered 500,000, making a very strong body. But strong as they were, with all their power, what had they done? It could not be said that they had done anything to deprive any class of the community of their rights. He denied that the Orange organization bound its members to any political party. The chaplain of the Lodge of which he was himself a member voted against him, and some members of the body in that county actually voted for what was called the Clear Grit.

Mr. BENJAMIN said he gave great credit to the junior member for Montreal (Mr. McGee) for the temperate manner in which he had treated the subject, and for refraining from bringing up those exciting details to which he had referred. But he could not give the same credit to the learned member for that city (Mr. Dorion) who at once took warlike ground against the Society, and took it for granted that all the evils in the country, and that all the riots and disturbances which occurred, originated with the Orangemen.

Mr. DORION—I distinctly said the contrary. I said a great deal was imputed to the Orangemen, but I did not enquire whether that was true or not, in view of the fact that much ill feeling arose from the existence of the institution.

Mr. BENJAMIN said that the very reverse was the case. Where Orangemen were strongest, there he believed peace prevailed to the greatest extent. It had been said that there was disunion among the Orangemen as to this Bill. It was asked for by the heads of the body. The bill came from the Society, and because he had been instructed by the heads of the Society by those who were his superiors, to present it, he did so. It had been insinuated that he would drop it at the second reading. Such was not his intention. He had been called upon to undertake the charge of the Bill, by those in authority, and whether he approved of it as a member of the Order or not, that concerned no one. He had been called upon by those in authority to present the Bill, and he obeyed the order. He had been attacked by the member for Haldimand, as the Pope of Belleville. Did he remember some few years ago when an old man, closed in a chamber in Belleville, with a child by his side, lay trembling on the floor in expectation of being ducked in the river? Was it not to that very Pope of Belleville he had recourse in his extremity? He (Mr. Benjamin) saved that old man from the torture which awaited him.

Mr. FOLEY—Surely the peaceable Orangemen would not have committed that violence.

Mr. BENJAMIN—It was not the Orangemen who did it. But if I then exercised the authority of Pope it was on behalf of that hon. gentleman who now slanders me.

Mr. MACKENZIE—How did you happen to have this extraordinary power over those who were not Orangemen?

Mr. BENJAMIN—My influence is not confined to Orangemen. I have quite as much influence in Belleville with those who are not Orangemen.

Mr. MACKENZIE—Was not Corby, who headed that mob, an Orangeman?

Mr. BENJAMIN—Corby has not been in connection with the Orange Association for the last 15 or 16 years.

Mr. McGEE, having obtained leave to speak a second time to the motion, again strongly deprecated leaving this question open for discussion, at a second stage. If it were now introduced, he pledged himself to the second reading to go fully into the whole history of Orangeism, which might cause a degree of excitement through the Province, that would be much to be deplored. One incident illustrated this. The affair of St. Patrick's Day was telegraphed to Montreal, not by himself, but by gentlemen of this press, and on returning to Montreal he was astonished to find that a public demonstration had been got up in his favor by his constituents. Instead of paying a quarter for a cab, and going quietly home, he was escorted home in a public procession with sky-rockets. This proved that an excited feeling could easily be roused very different in the two sections of the Province. In Toronto, it had manifested itself in the shape of brickbats, in Montreal in the shape of sky-rockets, the latter manifestation being of course the most agreeable to him. The Postmaster General had made a great point, that the Orange Society was not political, because it was not political. But all he had proved was that the Orangemen threw their influence sometimes into one scale, sometimes into another, as suited their own purposes. If they supported the hon. member for Toronto, it was because he had given to be a strong man, because his own strong hands had gained position for him. The Orangemen therefore gave him their support, desiring to have two strings to their bow, that if Brother Macdonald had to go out, they might have equal ground to stand upon when Brother Brown came in. (Laughter.)

A division was then taken on the motion for the introduction of the Bill, which was at first declared negatived on the following division.

The SPEAKER said his attention had been called to the fact that Mr. Fellowes was not in the Chamber when the motion was put from the chair. Taking away that member's name made the vote a tie. He (the Speaker) voted for the introduction of the Bill.

The Bill was then read a first time.

At the request of Mr. MACKENZIE, it was read at full length in English, and at the request of Mr. LABERGE, at full length in French.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved the second reading for to-morrow week.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON moved in amendment—that the Bill be not read a second time on Thursday week, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

This amendment, destroying the Bill, was carried by 54 to 46.

The House of Commons.

The attitude which the House of Commons has recently assumed is one deserving of all attention, and on examination, it is probable that we never were so nearly realizing the theory of popular government through the medium of representation, at least since the Restoration, as at this moment. In the undoubted and unmistakeable exercise of its will, the House of Commons displaced a Minister who had called it together to vindicate his policy which had been questioned by a previous Parliament. The occasion on which this, its legitimate function, was exercised was one which involved a great national principle, and there never was a vote of a majority given, which could be less open to an accusation of party feeling or influence. Nevertheless, because the result has been to put, we will not say into power, but into office, a Ministry which declares itself to have no policy but the will of the House of Commons, it seems to be the cue of the partizans of a defeated oligarchy in politics to declare that the House has acted precipitately, has floundered into a very morass of difficulty, out of which it is only in the power of the discarded Minister to rescue it. If those who affect to represent public opinion—a phrase which, if rightly interpreted, would be found to mean the creation of such opinion in the public as suits the purposes of its quasi exponents—would condescend to look with a more observant eye and a more unprejudiced judgment into the conduct of the House at this moment they would probably be induced to admit that that conduct is worthy of all praise; while at the same time it indicates a tendency to dissipate that system of class government which has so long prevailed in this country. If the course taken by the popular Branch of the Legislature, and which seems as much the product of an inspiration as of judicial action, means anything, it means an attempt to widen the arch of official choice; to substitute principles for names in the mechanism of government; and, in short, to apply the doctrine of free trade to the formation of Ministries. Of all the Conservatism which has been foisted upon our institutions, and which clings to them with the greatest tenacity, we conceive the preservation of a kind of circular system of office-holding to be the most notable; and we believe it has been noted and marked, almost intuitively, by the House of Commons. It seems as if that House was awakening to the responsibility it incurs when it places a Ministry in power. The emphatic disclaimers of mere party motives which now pervade that assembly seem to indicate a conviction that it is in no mood to be made a subservient instrument of personal ambition; and its position has seldom, if ever, been more dignified, or more worthy of the confidence of the country.

It is just at such a moment, when, as we have endeavoured to show, the House of Commons is conscious of its responsibilities, and evinces a desire to live up to them, that we hear it asserted that it is in reality in a condition of the most profound humiliation. We hear that the majority has turned itself out for its own and those of its leaders, and has put the minority to reign in its stead; that they are humble under evils which, having inflicted on themselves, they feel that they deserve; and they are not content to accept independent, unconstitutional, and unsound measures, because they are conscious that they are entitled to no better; and to this is added a protest against imputing the cripple of England in a common humiliation with an erring, peccant, and half-repentant Parliament. These are sweeping charges, and they would be utterly condemnatory of the body against which they are brought if it were possible that they are simply opposed and contradicted by facts. It needs something more than assertion clothed in elegant language and administered through the medium of well-poised sentences, to convince the people of England that the vote of the House of Commons on the Conspiracy to Murder Bill of Lord Palmerston, and which has brought about the existing Government-al situation, has eventuated in the humiliation of the majority that gave it. There has scarcely ever, perhaps never, been an occasion when the national feeling was so accurately represented, and when the thoughtful, passionless influence of public opinion operated without clamour or agitation on the mind of the Legislature towards the vindication of a great national and constitutional principle. The House of Commons faithfully reflected the feeling of the great majority of the people; and boldly, but not rashly, it adopted a course which threw upon the Crown the duty of seeking for new advisers. In that stress of choice, now more urgent than ever, which is the bane of our governing system, the Crown was obliged to have recourse to the assistance of that body of politicians who alone could be said to be available, and who presented themselves to Parliament, if not absolutely with reluctance, yet with a not unbecoming diffidence and consciousness of the peculiarities of their position. The House of Commons, in a generous spirit, and probably with a latent confidence in its own innate capability of keeping the machinery of the State in gear, accepted the situation, and has hitherto acted in conformity with the tacit and implied engagement to treat the ministry with all reasonable forbearance. To toleration, to a reception in a fair and unbiassed spirit of the measures of the Government, the House is indirectly pledged, and, on that understanding, it has evinced an honourable tendency to proceed. But according to the advocates of that which they call the Liberal party, but by which, in fact, they mean Lord Palmerston in power, the House is bound to go further, and to give active, positive, and gratuitous support to a Ministry in difficulties; and it is argued that, as things exist, the majority out of office is to carry on the Government for the minority in office, or rather that it is to be carried on jointly by both sides of the House, and more especially by that side which is not accountable for its results. Now, has not the course taken by the House on Monday evening with regard to the India Bill given a flat denial of this assumption? There can be no doubt that the question of what is to be done by the home government of India has got into an entanglement, for which, however, the House of Commons is not answerable; and the proposition of Lord John Russell to elicit the real opinion of Parliament on the subject without the embarrassment of battling over the details of two bad bills was worthy of every consideration. With a little too much eagerness, thinly veiled enough, the Government accepted that solution of the difficulty; but when Mr. Disraeli went further and sought to throw upon the subject the whole onus of initiating the required resolutions, and so shifting the entire responsibility from the shoulders of the Government, and resting it on the House itself, the House, true to its instincts and its duties, declined to assume a function which belonged properly to the Executive. In this respect it acted wisely, as well as constitutionally, and afforded a practical refutation of the sneering insinuations against its abdication of its legitimate province, and the abnegation of its trust, which had been circulated in print only a few hours before. Let, however, justice be done to Lord Palmerston. There is nothing in his demeanour, or in the course he has taken since his retirement from office, which warrants a belief that he is a party to or inspires the vapouring of what are supposed to be his organs in the press. If one is to judge by his conduct, it would seem as if he has detected the awakening of that spirit in the House of Commons which we have endeavoured to suggest and indicate in the foregoing observations, and he has had the tact—or why should we not say the good sense?—to discern that if the House is moderate, considerate, and unprejudiced, it is no longer subservient; that it has a will of its own; and that it is quite prepared to check and control, while it is ready to afford the fairest and most dispassionate judgment to the present or any other Government. It has simply asserted its privileges and its rights—no more; and while it continues to exercise those rights, and to vindicate those privileges temperately but firmly, it will receive the confidence of the country, which will rely on the representative branch of the Legislature for the good government of the State. The public will believe, as we contend they have every reason to believe, that Parliament is beginning to be influenced by higher motives than the triumphs of party or the ascendancy of this or that section of political aspirants to office; and, whoever may be the men who exercise the functions of the Executive, there will be a well-founded persuasion that the House of Commons will perform its duty as the great instrument of popular impression on the government of this country. As we began, so we conclude, by expressing a conviction that we are at the beginning of the realization of our constitutional theory of representative government. The machinery of that representative may be defective, imperfect, inadequate to the full flow of the great principle of our Constitution; but, at least, the process of filtration is in action. The rest is merely a question of time.—Illustrated London News.

Jealousy.

Jealousy is cruel as the grave—not the grave that opens its deep bosom to receive, and shelter from further storms, the worn and forlorn pilgrim who "rejoices exceedingly and is glad" when he can find its repose; but cruel as the grave when it yawns and swallows down from the lap of luxury, from the summit of fame, from the bosom of love, the desire of many eyes and heart.—Jealousy is a two-headed asp, biting backwards and forwards. Among the deadly things upon the earth, or in the sea, or flying through the deadly night air of malarious regions, few are more noxious than is jealousy. And of all mad passions there is not one that has a vision more distorted, or a move unreasonable fury. To the jealous eye white looks black, yellow looks green, and the very sunshine turns deadly lurid. There is no innocence, no justice, no generosity, that is not touched with suspicion, save just the jealous person's own.

And jealousy is an utter folly; for it helps nothing and saves nothing. If your friend's love is going, or gone, to another, will your making yourself hateful and vindictive stay it or bring it back? If it is not leaving you, is there no risk in rendering yourself so unlovely?

Command me to all horrors, hours rather than to a jealous person, especially a jealous husband. There is neither reason nor mercy in her when once thoroughly struck through with this fearful passion.

She renders herself altogether repulsive by it—an object more of dread than affection to those who have loved her best. And if she regains not her self command, and return not to her senses, she frequently destroys utterly the attachments she most has prized.

Her friend may indeed refuse to forsake her; but it will be duty that bids him stay, and never will he be able to forget what an abject thing she has once appeared.

But let not any too rigorously judge the conduct of a jealous woman or a jealous man. Remember that the maniac suffers. To-be-sure, the suffering is from selfishness; often it is without a shadow of a cause, but still it is suffering, and it is intense. Pity it—bear with it. You may yourself fall into temptation. It is a sorer curse, a more certain and fatal blight to the heart on which it seizes than it can be to those against whom its spite is hurled. Then, while none should bend too far to the whim of jealousy, all should be watchful and careful that it enter not their own heart.

How Railroads are Made.

From the Waverly Magazine.

The following is a stray leaf from the chapter on this subject:—"Smith is a broker; Smith has an office in Wall St.; Smith's followers are many; while Smith is one of the few sharp ones which his followers are not. In this office in Wall St. he discovers a scheme on foot for a railroad.—Adding his magnificent presence, he attends the primary meeting, and declaims loudly and descants largely upon the benefit, &c., and the association is formed. Engineers lay out the route, and cypher out the cost at forty millions, which the benign Smith induces them to reduce one half, or maybap three-quarters, not to frighten the dear public. Smith and the sharp ones advise their followers to invest. The ten or twenty millions are spent—the road is but half built. Then Smith and the sharp ones magnanimously loan the new company the other ten or twenty, drawing interest on their money by mortgage. The road runs, cannot pay expenses, and this load of interest borrows money on another mortgage. Smith bewails their condition with tears in his eyes, is sorry for his investment, but the stockholders must come forward and rescue them. Smith harangues; for which assertion there is no proof, it never having done one fortieth of it; and so until smash goes the whole concern, Smith and the sharp ones have got a good rail road which will pay more than expenses, but can't pay that and interest."

Lucknow.

The capture of Lucknow by Sir Colin Campbell, of which we have this week received the gratifying intelligence, took place exactly as he had planned it. His forces—one part of which, the division under Sir H. Rose, was unable to close up—were insufficient entirely to surround the place. He could not, therefore, prevent the tumultuous and disorderly mutineers from escaping; and a multitude, said to amount to 50,000, have rushed out, to continue for some time in Rohilcund and Bundelcund a desultory and predatory warfare, devastating the country, and forcing us to employ troops to destroy them. We regard that as an evidence that the means at the Commander-in-Chief's disposal were comparatively insufficient in effect so great a work, and a striking testimony to the skill with which he has executed his task. He seems to have foreseen every obstacle he was likely to encounter, to have planned his measures in detail with as consummate accuracy as that by which he formerly relieved and led away the beleaguered English garrison of Lucknow, and to have achieved a a complete success according to his own designs. He employed his artillery well, and chiefly before he sent forward his troops, and with true sagacity saved his own men while he destroyed the enemy. Of them it is estimated 2000 were killed; and all that we yet know of our loss leads us to suppose that it does not exceed as many hundreds, though it includes eight officers. We have captured 117 guns, rescued two ladies, and obtained at once, with possession of the town, the submission of the principal landowners of Oude. Not sorry, apparently, to be relieved of the presence of the destructive soldiery, the townspeople and the villagers were resuming their habitual occupations; and industry, under our protecting rule, was hastening to sweep away the traces of war and its ravages. Next to the glad feeling of triumph we have at our countrymen's success is the great satisfaction we experience at learning that the industrious people and their leading men, sensible of the security they will be sure to obtain under our Government, have returned to their peaceful pursuits. The late strong hold of the mutineers is now wrested from them. There is no other city they are likely to occupy; and though they may still do much mischief, as armed robbers, dacoits, &c., the complete restoration of our power, now necessary and wished for by the bulk of the people, is assured. It is plain from the several telegrams that all Sir Colin Campbell's Lieutenants, and all the officers and men, most zealously and ably supported their skilful commander; and England never had greater reason to be proud of her sons than throughout this unforseen and arduous contest. Sir Colin Campbell, by the latest advices, remained at Lucknow; but from thence he has despatched troops to pursue the fugitives. They will not be allowed again to organize in masses, and we can congratulate our readers that before the hot season has commenced the most essential of Sir Colin Campbell's tasks has been accomplished.—Illustrated London News.

The Trial of Dr. Bernard.

The progress of this trial appears to have created extraordinary excitement, not only throughout England, but over a large portion of continental Europe. The following are the closing sentences of the able defence made by Mr. James, Q. C.:—

"I have now commented upon the facts of this case, and I ask whether it is one in which you will stretch the law and give a verdict for the Crown; whether the evidence is such as should induce you to consign to death the prisoner at the bar? I should have thought that when, under the dim twilight of that morning, Orsini and Pierri expiated their crime upon the guillotine at Paris, enough had been done to vindicate the demands of French justice. It should have thought that when they were defeated upon their Conspiracy Bill which they introduced to please the Emperor—whose haughty commands had gone in a different strain to the weaker Courts of Sardinia and Switzerland—that the Crown prosecutors would have been satisfied. But, no; although the charge of conspiracy is still hanging over the prisoner, it is sought to find him guilty on a charge of wilful murder under an Act of Parliament which is not applicable to the case, and which I believe to be—so far as the law is concerned—a mockery and a sham. The great object of the French Government is, if possible, to establish through you, gentlemen of the jury, that an exile is not to be protected in this country. It has been the pride of the country to be, as was said by Cicero of Rome, "Regum, populorum, nationum, portus et refugium." How true has that been of this country! We have had exiled kings here, an exiled priesthood, an exiled nobility, we have had the Emperor of the French an exile here, plotting against the throne of Louis Phillippe, and now his object is to destroy that very asylum which afforded a refuge to himself.—Will you allow the laws of England to be perverted for such a purpose? I trust that you will hesitate long before you do so, and that you will see doubts enough in this case which will compel you to say that the crime charged in the indictment has not been proved against the prisoner. I need not remind you that it has been of the greatest advantage to this country, that her free shores have been opened to exiles from other lands. The requisition of Philip II. of Spain led to an insurrection in the Netherlands, and conducted to the more firm establishment of Protestantism in this country; the revocation of the edict of Nantes drove to our shores the Saurins, the Romillys, and the Labouchères, who have shed a lustre on this country. Will you, then, at the bidding of a neighbouring despot, destroy the asylum which aliens have hitherto enjoyed? No; I am satisfied that you will not. I implore you at least to pause before you do so, because I believe, conscientiously that you do not see at present the result that may flow from this proceeding.—Gentlemen, I have done. I have discharged my duty towards the unhappy gentleman at the bar to the best of my ability. I have discharged it as an English advocate, I believe, ought to have discharged it—fearlessly and conscientiously. Let me urge you to discharge yours also fearlessly, firmly, and conscientiously. You will have the case left in your hands, after an able reply from the Attorney General, by one who will hold the scales with an even and impartial hand. I implore you to let the verdict be your own, uninfluenced by the ridiculous fears of French armaments or French invasions, such as were raised in Peltier's case. You, gentleman, will not be intimidated by foreign dictation to consign the accused to the scaffold; you will not pervert and wrest the law of England to please a foreign dictator? No. Tell the prosecutor in this case that the jury-box is the sanctuary of English liberty. Tell him that on this spot your predecessors have resisted the arbitrary power of the Crown, backed by the influence of crown-serving judges. Tell him that under every difficulty and danger your predecessors have secured the political liberties of the people. Tell him that the verdicts of English juries are founded on the eternal and immutable principles of justice. Tell him that, panoplied in that armour, no threat of armament or invasion can awe you. Tell him that, though 600,000 French bayonets glittered before you, though the roar of French cannon thundered in your ears, you will give a verdict which your own breasts and consciences will sanctify and approve, careless whether that verdict pleases or displeases a foreign despot, or secures or shakes and destroys forever the throne which a tyrant has built upon the ruins of the liberty of a once free and mighty people. (Distinct clapping of hands and other symptoms of approval were manifested by a portion of the audience at the conclusion of the learned counsel's address, and it was some time before the ordinary aspect of the court was restored.)

On the announcement of the verdict of "Not Guilty," a scene occurred unexampled, perhaps, in an English tribunal.—From the gallery first, and then in an instant afterwards from the floor of the court, proceeded a loud shout of exultation. The cheering was again and again repeated—the excitement was contagious—and many of the ladies of quality present waved their handkerchiefs in token of their delight. Vainly did the Lord Chief Justice endeavor by voice and gesture to still the tumult, and as powerless was the stentorian lungs of Mr. Harker, though exerted to the utmost, to restore silence. The prisoner, who was extremely excited, flourished his white pocket-handkerchief over his head, and several times attempted to speak. By this time the verdict had reached the ears of the crowd assembled outside the Old Bailey, and the rapturous cheer which they raised, and after repeated, could be distinctly heard within the court. The judges, unable, and perhaps unwilling to check this spontaneous ebullition of popular feeling, but yet not liking to sanction it by their presence, rose to depart. The look of Lord Campbell at this moment was of itself a study. Slightly ruffled at the defiance which had been shown to his authority his Lordship still retained his good humor, and seemed disposed to yield a momentary homage to the vox populi. It may be reasonably presumed that he could not be indifferent to the result of a trial in which he had played so conspicuous a part; but whatever his feelings may have been in that respect it was impossible for a spectator to divine them from his countenance. Bernard at length made a successful attempt to be heard, and, addressing the jury, said, with much vehemence of manner,—Gentlemen—That verdict is an expression of the truth. I am not guilty, and it proves that in England there is and always will be liberty, which will crush tyranny, whatever and wherever it may be. All honor to an English jury! (Renewed cheers.)

The trial commenced on Monday, in the Central Criminal Court, which was crowded to excess. The prisoner, when asked whether he was guilty or not guilty, said that the court had no jurisdiction to try him on this indictment, and he declined to plead. Mr. James said he did this by the advice of his counsel. Lord Campbell said the court could order the plea of not guilty to be entered if the prisoner refused to plead. The prisoner, when asked whether he would have a jury half Englishmen and half foreigners, said he trusted with confidence to a jury of Englishmen. The Attorney General, at the conclusion of a moderate speech from the Crown, said that he believed there would be some important questions of law raised, the principal of which was, whether the prisoner could be held to be a British subject under the provisions of the act; but this would be a question for their lordships. Lord Campbell said that any points of law that might be raised would be reserved for the consideration of the fifteen judges. If a verdict of guilty was returned by the jury, the judges would postpone judgment until the questions of law had finally been disposed of. Sir F. Kelly said that, if there should be any point of law, however it might be opposed to justice, he would be the last to urge that the prisoner should not have full benefit of it. French witnesses were then examined, to prove the attempt of the 14th of January, and the deaths arising from it.

On Tuesday the trial was resumed. The interest in the case seemed, if anything, to have increased. Bernard listened to the evidence with great attention, and occasionally took notes. A number of witnesses were exam

The Examiner.

THURSDAY, MAY 13, 1858.

NEW YORK, May 10.

The steamer "Vanderbilt" arrived at an early hour this morning, with London dates of 28th, news meagre.

Liverpool breadstuffs market moderately active, at full rates for flour and wheat and stiffer prices for corn. Buyers demanded a reduction for the latter. Slight improvement in London breadstuffs market.—American flour scarce. The Liverpool cotton market firm, at Friday's prices sales, Monday and Tuesday 11,000 bales, 6f which 5,000 were for speculators and export.

London Money Market firmer, with a slight improvement in consols. The closing quotations on Tuesday being 97¼ for money 97¼ to 97¼ account.

Political news unimportant.

In the House of Commons General Peel stated in reply to a question that the whole cost of the India war would be defrayed by the East India Company.

The consideration of the bill providing for the government of India, was set down for Friday.

The Lords in the budget imposing a penny stamp duty on checks was adopted without opposition.

The Fiche duties had passed through a second reading.

An amendment offered to the increase of the spirit duty in Ireland, having failed by a vote of 227 to 35, the opposition being confided to Irish members.

Business in England was generally stagnant.

France is to send a private commissioner to China.

The election in Paris has resulted in the choice of two government candidates, and one of the opposition, the latter being Jules Faire.

There is an immense increase in the French navy budget for 1858.

Paris papers however deny that there is any increase in the French armament.

The iron masters of France have petitioned Government for an increased duty on foreign iron. The trade of Paris has been seriously checked by the violent comments of Parisian journals on the acquittal of Bernard, but at last advices it was recovering.

Count Esterhazy, the Austrian ambassador to St. Petersburg, has retired from that post.

Austria and Prussia has come to an amicable arrangement as to the policy in the Holstein affair.

The Sardinia Chambers have adopted the principles of the Conspiracy Bill by a large majority.

There is another dispute between England and Persia—the latter country having taken possession of territory in Affghanistan, and detained a great number of Affghanistans.

Frightful Railroad Accident Near Utica.

SEVERAL PERSONS KILLED AND OVER FORTY WOUNDED.

UTICA, N. Y., May 11.

A frightful railroad accident occurred this morning at halfpast six o'clock on the Central Railroad, by the crushing of a bridge over the Sagnort Creek, some three and a half miles west of this city, near Whitesboro, seven or eight persons already dead, five of six others are barely alive, and the injured numbered forty or more.

The killed are A. Moore, of Rising Sun, Indiana, head crushed and has since died.

Two children of Abraham Mack of Cincinnati.

An Irishman aged apparently 60 years, name unknown, his head is entirely jammed in, he seems to have died instantly.

A negro whose legs are cut off.

The wounded are James Ward, of Schenectady, conductor of the train, badly bruised but it is believed not dangerously.

Wm. Perkins, grocer, Rochester, N. Y., very badly hurt about the head and chest; probably will not recover.

Walter H. Soube, of Rome, Richmond County, Ohio, injured about the spine, but it is thought not dangerously.

H. Beltman, Cincinnati, Ohio, very seriously injured about head and chest; arm also fractured. It is feared he will not recover.

George Coil, Columbus, Ohio, wounded in the leg, but not seriously.

The three following are from Louisville, Kentucky:—C. F. Dusher, a lad, 15 or 16 years old, injured about the head slightly.

Mrs. Schenck, arm and head badly hurt, Miss Aldrick, slightly bruised.

A. Cobb, Yorkshire, Cataraugus County, New York, slightly cut on the head, and shoulders slightly injured.

Mr. and Mrs. Sprowen, residence not ascertained. Mrs. S. has about three inches of the scalp torn off, a tooth knocked in, and otherwise seriously injured. Faint hopes are entertained of recovery.

Carl Hover, of St. Louis, bound for Germany, was severely bruised. He was accompanied by his wife and child; the former is somewhat bruised; the latter, an infant, some two years of age, was badly burned by the upsetting of the stove in the car, and probably will not recover.

Mr. Riley, of Albany, brakesman on train, has a broken leg.

W. E. Truby, superintendent of the Chicago and R. I. Railroad, badly cut over the head, but not dangerously.

S. S. Horton, Binghampton, slightly bruised.

Wm. Hart, Cleveland, Ohio; had contusion on the head, and arm bruised, but not dangerously.

A. A. Langworthy, St. Clairville, Chatagauy county, New York, slightly injured.

R. W. Balkley and sister Mary, of New York, both slightly bruised.

Mr. Bicknell, of Rome, father of cashier Bicknell, badly hurt.

A lady from Kentucky, unknown, badly wounded, and probably will not recover.

Abram Mack, wife and children, all more or less injured. Two of the children were dead. The parents will recover.

David Levi, Cincinnati, has a bad compression of the ribs, but will probably recover.

Raphael Bowman, Strasberg, Germany, has a fractured leg and wounds on the head.

John McDonald, of Morris, Oswego co., badly hurt about the head and right arm, but will recover.

Mr. Yates, of Fulton, scalp loosened, but not seriously injured.

C. E. Knowles, of Samborton Bridge, New Hampshire, terribly bruised about the head, is now deranged, and can hardly recover.

The wife of Michael Broderick, of Boston, had her scalp completely cut around; her husband and child on adjoining seats, were not injured.

Mrs. Mary Bachelder, mother-in-law of Dr. L. W. Easquelle, of St. Johns, Mich., was hurt across the neck and shoulders, and internally.

Many others were more or less bruised, but none so seriously as those named.

The accident occurred to the Cincinnati Express, due here at 6:20 a. m. It was somewhat behind time at Whitesboro', and was coming at a high rate of speed when it met on the bridge over the Sanquoit Creek the Utica Accommodation for the West, each on its own track. The Express crossed the bridge, but as the passenger cars of the Express and freight cars of the Accommodation came upon it, the north side gave way, precipitating the freight cars into the creek, and piling the passenger cars one above the other, splintering the platforms and seats to atoms as the cars struck the abutment.

The persons injured were all on the Express. The passenger car on the Accommodation did not reach the bridge.

Different stories are told as to the cause of the accident. One is that an axle of the Express baggage car broke as it reached the bridge and thus threw the trains together. The other attributes the casualty to the rottenness of the timbers of the bridge.

Major Priest, the superintendent of the road, happened to be on the Accommodation train. He at once despatched a sufficient number of men to the relief of the sufferers. A large number of the wounded were immediately brought to this city, and taken to Bagg's Hotel, the McGregor House, the Northern Hotel, and the Railroad House, and the rest were cared for at Whitesboro'. The physicians were summoned, and everything was done that could be to relieve their sufferings.

Fire in Boston—Four Lives Lost.

BOSTON May 2, 1858.

A fire broke out this morning in the upper part of a large seven story granite building on Federal street, occupied in the lower stories by the Douglas Axe Company, and in the upper part by Messrs. Sanborn, Bazin & Elsworth as a printing office and bindery. This building was entirely destroyed, only a portion of its walls being left standing.

By the falling of a wall of this building the following persons were killed:—Francis Cutting and Frank Tuttle, firemen; Patrick Reardon and Mrs. Moran.

The adjoining building was occupied by Messrs. Grant, Warren & Co., extensive paper dealers, and was also destroyed.

A brick dwelling, occupied as a boarding house, adjoining, was nearly destroyed by the falling walls, and it was here the fatal accident took place.

The total loss is estimated at $200,000, which is mostly covered by insurance.

The two firemen killed belonged to Tremont Engine Company No. 12. Their bodies were recovered.

Vancouver's Island.

We had the pleasure, during the past week, of conversing with a gentlemen direct from Victoria, Vancouver's Island, who has seen specimens of the gold obtained from that region, and represents it as being quite coarse; one piece, weighed in his presence, was worth a fraction over $12. He is informed that from $5 to $15 and $20 per day have been washed out, but thinks that there are more miners whose average product is under $8 per day than above that amount.

The Hudson's Bay Company's steamer "Beaver" recently arrived at Victoria, from Forts Hope and Langley, bringing sixteen pounds of gold dust, that had been traded from the miners on Frazer's and Thompson's Rivers. Several private parcels were sent down for the purchase of supplies, mining tools, &c.

Nearly all the half-bloods and French, together with many other residents on Vancouver's Island are in the gold region, and it is thought that there are already there, and en route, from six to eight hundred persons. We believe that the northern portion of our territory is becoming well nigh deserted. The lumbering establishments on the waters of Puget Sound find it extremely difficult to keep in motion, owing to the number of hands that have left and are constantly leaving for the northern El Dorado. Col. Fitzhugh of Bellingham Bay, is likewise in an unpleasant predicament with regard to his coal mine. That article is now in good demand, but his hands have nearly all left him—operations in the mine are about at a stand still, and the mail steamer in the Sound is compelled to burn wood at $4 per cord.—Olympia Pioneer and Democrat.

A Summer Trip.

The Montreal Ocean Steamship Company advertise a passage in one of the first-class Liverpool Steamships from Chicago to Liverpool over the Grand Trunk Railroad of Canada, for from eighty to one hundred dollars first-class, and in third class forty-two dollars. These ships have been on every line of vessels crossing the Atlantic. The accommodations are acknowledged to be surpassed by none, while it forms in connection with the Grand Trunk Railroad of Canada the most pleasant route for either pleasure seekers or business men, giving as it does an opportunity of viewing the most magnificent scenery on the North American continent. To emigrants it is the most desirable from its avoiding the many impositions to which we are sorry to say, they are subject in New York and other of our eastern ports. The Grand Trunk Railroad forms, by its connections with the Great Western and Michigan Central Railroads, the best and most direct route from Boston and other eastern points to Chicago and the West generally; it commends itself to the travelling public by its punctuality, certainty of making connections, and completeness of its arrangements generally, among which we must not omit to mention that baggage is checked through from Chicago. How much better for our pleasure seekers to take a trip by this line to Quebec or Boston, and from Quebec by the M. O. S. Co.'s ships to Europe; viewing, as they can, the grandest and most romantic scenery of the old and new worlds, with no more, if at so great an expense, than to ram pursuit after pleasure at fashionable watering places.—Chicago Democrat.

A Curious Story.

The Edinburgh corresponded of the Yefeshire Advertiser is responsible for the following story:—The scene is laid in a farmhouse not above one hundred miles from Pennicuik, and was enacted only a short time ago. A servant girl hired herself in the said farmhouse to do the dairy work, &c., about the place, which she did for a short time, taking care, however, to leave open on several occasions letters addressed to herself, in which continued reference was made to an estate in the west of Scotland, accompanied with a castellated residence, and worth £5,000 a year. The bait took, and a son of the worthy farmer threw off his old love, said to be a fair dame in the kingdom, and was immediately on with the new; questions were asked on both sides, and plausible answers returned. For example—"What caused you to become a dairymaid?" "Oh, because I wished to be able to instruct the servants on my estate." That was deemed satisfactory enough, and our heroine was invited to the table in the diningroom, where she enjoyed the good things of this life, laughing in her sleeve at the nice trick she had played. Things progressed favourably. A match was proposed and mutually agreed upon. The gentleman ordered suits of clothing for several friends, and all went merry as a marriage bell. The castles built in the air were innumerable. The fine shooting was dilated upon, and arrangements made for a condescending visit to see the old folks at home during the season. The fair lady, when spoken to about the matter, referred to her agents in this city, and no suspicion existed in the minds of any but that all was right. At length the banns were proclaimed and the marriage all arranged for, but when the hour came there was a bridegroom, but the bride had fled! Of course, it was thought that the lady had been detained by some unforseen accident, but as the time went on there was not a word of her entering even an appearance. Inquiry was then made at the "agent's," who said he certainly acted in that capacity, but it was to defend her in a case of petty larceny, and some other misdemeanours.

Electric Telegraph too Slow.

A Mr. Boggs, in England, has recently contrived a very ingenious modification of the electric-telegraph apparatus, by means of which, if the execution of the plan proves practicable, as he imagines, that enormous sheet, the London Times, could be transcribed in the space of sixty minutes over a single wire. The transmission of the fluid is, to all purposes, instantaneous; but the placing of the message upon the wires, letter by letter, is limited to human capabilities, and, as is well known, is an affair of time, even when in the hands of the most skilful and experienced operator. The new plan is somewhat as follows: Bands of gutta percha, about six inches broad and three inches thick, are perforated with holes upon both sides, at short but equal distances apart, and arranged so as to roll upon wheels or drums. When a very long message is to be transmitted, it is apportioned among several operators, each having his gutta percha band and a box of copper pins. These pins he sets up in holes, one by one or two by two, with one or more intervening holes empty, in such a manner that they shall indicate the letter to be transmitted. In this way it is claimed that all the desirable combinations for telegraphic alphabets can be readily affected, and a conventional typography arranged, in which experienced operators may achieve a great rapidity of execution.—The bands are then placed in connection with the machine, and each rolled off in succession, at the most rapid rate, by means of steam, the points of the pins, at the moment of contact, transmitting the current. The labor of composition is placed in a requisite number of persons, and each portion can be almost instantaneously forwarded; the wires, meantime, being free from other communications, an advantage which will be greatly appreciated. If the idea should be practically achieved, the time occupied in the transmitting of several columns of a newspaper would be minutes instead of hours.—Boston Traveller.

It is stated in an Athens journal that a manuscript copy on parchment of the Gospels in Greek, and bearing the date 480, has recently been found in the garret of a house, in that city. It is said to be in good preservation, and has been deposited in the public library of Athens.

At the last Lincolnshire Winter Assizes, Mr. Justice Crompton, the presiding Judge fined eighty-seven magistrates of the county, liable to serve the office of grand jurors, £20 each for non-attendance, some difficulty being experienced in forming a grand jury.

Marshal Pelissier gave a dinner on Saturday last, to which he invited several English officers at present in Paris. The Marshal expressed to those gentlemen his high esteem for the British Army.

It is announced that Ferouk Khan will leave Marseilles on April 15th, and that, before returning to Persia, he will stay three months at Constantinople, to settle all questions relating to the Turkish boundaries on the Persian frontier.

The letter-bags are conveyed between the Keith Railway station and the town of Keith in a wheelbarrow, on which the letters V. B. are pompously emblazoned.

It is said that overtures have been made several times to Thiers in order to induce him to join the present French Government. A Senatorship has, it is declared, been twice refused.

THE WAY IT OPERATES.—Young ladies educated to despise mankind, generally finish their studies by running away with the footmen; or else some circumrider.

Punch has a portrait of the "next British Ambassador to Naples." It is a 74-pounder, behind which stands an English tar with his hands on the fuse.

Madame Orsini has left Paris to return to the Italian village, where she has long been established as schoolmistress.

—Jacob Swipes, a German butcher, residing near Detroit, eloped with the wives of a farmer named Fulmer and a man named Schneider, on the 26th ult. Officers were sent in pursuit.

STARTLING RUMOR.—The Lexington, Mo., Expositor, of the 27th ult., says:—"On Saturday night last, passengers on the steamer Admiral, just down from Leavenworth, brought the startling news that Col. Johnston's force had been attacked by the Mormons, under Brigham Young, and badly defeated—the Mormons capturing thirteen pieces of artillery. The story goes that two messengers had just arrived from the scene of action with despatches for government; one of them proceeded immediately to Washington. We trust that the whole thing is a hoax."

AN AGED BRIDE.—The Petersburg Express records the marriage, in Dinwiddie County, Va., on the 17th ult., of Mr. John W. Sturdivant, in the 22nd year of his age, to the well-to-do Miss Martha Oliver, aged 80 years. Maiden ladies who read this announcement may take courage and persevere.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWY SARNIA BRANCH.—The first trip of the iron horse on this line westward from Komoka. The locomotive, "Union," drew a number of cars laden with iron for the continuation of the track towards Sarnia. The engine was gaily decorated with flags and evergreens, and its appearance created no little excitement among the inhabitants along the route of the line, many of whom had never before seen the "locomoker." We understand that the Great Western Company have rails enough on hand to enable the whole track to be laid with all practicable speed.—Free Press.

RUSSIAN TELEGRAPH TO AMERICA.—St. Petersburg accounts up to March 25th, mention that among other schemes now projected, there is a grand line of telegraph between Russia and North America. The plan is to lay the wire through Siberia, thence under water from the north-eastern point to Asia, to the coast of the Russian possessions on the American continent, and finally, to be then joined to the wires of the United States. Although this gigantic undertaking, when mentioned, may lead many persons to look upon the matter with astonishment, and to consider the object as belonging to the fabulous, yet its execution, after all may not be doubted as possible when the vast improvements and inventions of recent times are duly considered.

The Orsini Shells.

James Davies Parker examined:—I am in the employ of Messrs. Herrings, wholesale druggists in Aldersgate Street. I know the prisoner, and remember his making a purchase at Messrs. Herrings' on the 11th of November last. He bought 8 lbs. of absolute alcohol and 10 lbs. of pure nitric acid. On the 15th of December he called again and purchased the same quantities of the same materials as before. Having taken them away he returned in about a quarter of an hour and purchased 1 lb. of quicksilver. I know the composition of fulminating powder. It is made of these materials amalgamated, in the proportions of the articles which were bought on the 15th of December. I asked his name and he gave it.

Edward Chambers Nicholson, examined by Mr. Welsby.—I'm a partner in the firm of Simpson & Co. manufacturing chemists, of the Atlas Works, Lockshields, Walworth. Our house is engaged in making fulminating powder for Government. The ingredients of which it is made are mercury, absolute alcohol, and nitric acid; the proportions being 1 part by weight of mercury, 8 parts by weight of alcohol, and 10 parts by weight of nitric acid. Absolute alcohol is alcohol, or spirit of wine without water. It is 100 above proof, and proof spirit, therefore, is made by the mixture of equal quantities of alcohol and water. In order to make fulminating powder the mercury is dissolved in nitric acid, and the solution thus obtained is added to the alcohol. A violent reaction ensues, accompanied by the evolution of masses of white vapour, and the fulminated mercury is precipitated in the form of a dense sandy powder, varying in color from grayish to brownish yellow. The purest and strongest, however, is a perfect white. The powder so obtained is much more explosive in its character than gunpowder. We keep it in a wet state, and it is then perfectly harmless.

M. Charles Pioet deposed—I am chef d'escadron of artillery and director of the chemical laboratory of artillery at Paris. I examined the contents of a grenade, which I analysed in the chemical laboratory, and discovered to be fulminate of mercury pure, with some particles of iron.

Mr. William Tozer.—I am manager of the gunpowder works at the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich, and superintendent of the chemical laboratory. I had not before seen the instrument which you have just put into my hand, and nothing of this description has ever been used by the British army that I am aware of. I never saw an instrument similar to it before. I should say that a hand grenade more nearly resembles it than any other weapon. It is about the same size, but a hand grenade has no nipples like this, and nothing of the sort that I have ever seen explodes by means of nipples and caps. All the hand grenades that I have previously known explode by a fusee or some other means of ignition. I am familiar with fulminate of mercury, and its strength, as used in the British army, is at least twenty times greater than that of gunpowder. I have made experiments with the two substances upon the same kind of shell. I used 100 grains of fulminate of mercury, and it broke the shell into 155 fragments; while 1300 grains of gunpowder broke the shell into only twenty-five fragments.

Genius.

From the Waverly Magazine.

Man, created in the image of his Maker, must necessarily stand forth as the noblest monument of God's creative power. Yet, possessing as he does the endowments of intellect and reason, he is culpable before God if he does not exercise those faculties with which He has endowed him. Nothing ever emanated from the hand of its Almighty Architect without a purpose. The most insignificant insect that crawls upon the earth, has a purpose in the economy of creation; how great and responsible then are the duties of man, the master-piece and perfection of Divine creation.

"But Nature varies; man, and brutal beast,
And herbage gay, and scaly fishes mute.
Search where thou will, each differs in its kind."

And so man differ in their physical organization, so do they in their mental. As the works of the same artist differ, so do the works of God. He has not blent all portions of the earth with like facility of soil and mildness of climate; yet, not more varied is either than are the faculties of the human mind. Take two individuals possessing the same educational advantages, and the circumstances of whose lives have been precisely alike; while one never attains to a position above the ordinary walks of life, the other stalks onward, by the power of his intellect, toward the goal of human greatness.

This innate principle of the mind, which acts as a motive power in raising man above his fellow man in the scale of eminence, is genius. Genius, as its name imports, is a guiding and inspiring divinity; or, rather, that innate principle of the immortal mind whose restless throbbings are the main spring of our highest aspirations. Circumstances may modify the development of genius, and education give it a brighter lustre, but it is genius itself that enables man to triumph over obstacles and surmount difficulties.

In every age of the world we behold men rising by the power of their intellect above the mass of the people. We see Galileo struggling with the superstition of his age, and even imprisoned for expressing those views which his mighty genius conceived, and which were recognized at a subsequent and more enlightened period of the world. We behold Columbus, though ridiculed by the people, embarking upon that bold and hazardous enprise which his genius had conceived, and which resulted in the discovery of the New World. Newton, borne by his lofty genius into regions celestial, and roaming amid the planets, compute their magnitude and velocity, and solve the great problem of gravitation. Franklin, experimenting with the lightning of heaven, and anon plucking the electric shaft, the fiery bolt itself from the hand of Jove, rendering it subservient to man, and ultimately to become the winged messenger of thought. Fulton, persevering in the application of steam power to ships, amid doubts and discouragements. Not only is genius the source of every invention, but it is the shrine at which the public will ever bow.

Witness those men who have acted in the political drama, and whose genius has swayed public opinion as the storm agitates the ocean, or, like the Maelstrom, have drawn into the vortex of their imagination all around them. Witness a Pit, a Fox, and a Cromwell; or, near home, a Henry and a Webster; witness a Luther and a Whitfield. They were endowed with genius. Their minds were radiant with that intellectual light which, bursting forth with an irresistible spontaneity, raises man to the very apex of human grandeur. This innate principle of the mind will not lie dormant, but will burst forth like the pent up fires of Vesuvius. Look at the instance of West; when but a mere child, he manifested so great a taste for that art for which he became so celebrated. The young Corsican, when walking bare-headed in the garden during a severe thunder storm, wrapt in the thoughts of his youthful mind, unconscious of the raging elements, gave a manifestation of that genius in embryo, that shook the world in after years. Schiller, when a lad, was found by his parents, seated in a lofty tree amidst one of the wildest thunderstorms. When they called him in, he reluctantly left his seat, as he wished to learn from whence the lightning came. In Burns, the Peasant Bard of Scotia, we see an embodyment of genius unpolished by education. Thus, we behold men in science and literature, who, like Bacon, and Newton, Milton and Shakspeare, and a host of others, have dipped their pens in intellect and in "thoughts that breathe and words that burn," have bequeathed to the world imperishable monuments of their genius.

Genius, combined with taste, will not only enable man to climb the "steep where Fame's proud temple shines afar," but in every effort and enterprise in life, to triumph over obstacles and surmount difficulties. And yet, how oft has genius, brilliant and sensitive genius, been spurned and trampled upon by the cold and unfeeling world. How oft have those, gifted as it were with a spark of Divinity, to purify and enlighen, and whose souls, like an æolian harp, changed the vulgar wind, as it passed through its strings into articulate melody, been doomed to poverty and suffering. Burns, the gifted bard of "Bonnie Doon," compelled to perform the mental drudgery of a custom-house. Homer, writing his immortal Epic in penury and darkness. Bacon and Galileo, languishing in priestly dungeons. The delicate Tasso, pining in the cell of a madhouse. Cervantes, maimed and in prison.

Again, genius, whose throne is the intellect—whose dominion the universe, too often proves a curse to it's possessor. With talent perverted, with a brilliant genius pandering to the baser passions and grossest sensualities, and worshipping the golden calf of self love in following up the aspirations of an insatiate and misguided ambition—how often has the individual fallen! History will point you to a Cæsar, a Charles the fifth, and a Bonaparte. Byron, born an English peer, the highest worldly honors were his by inheritance, possessing a brilliant genius and winning for himself a proud niche in the temple of Fame. Yet, alas! with the soul of a poet striving toward the Infinite and Eternal, he fell! consumed as it were by the fire of his own heart. And is it strange that he fell? He, who wrote his most brilliant production to prove that vice was a certainty and virtue an accident! —And when brought to the confines of the eternal world admitted he had no hope, but was taking a leap in the dark. And Burns, whose muse savored too oft of the ale-cup and the libertine. A Paine, a Hume, and a Voltaire, bending the whole energies of their souls to subvert Christianity, poisoning the literature of their age, and leaving behind them an influence which time alone can correct.

The Murder at Angus.

Mary Coots examined—Am wife of the deceased. I live at Angus. I remember the evening of the 23rd March. Angus is ten miles from this (Barrie.) He got home from Barrie at about 7½ o'clock on the evening train. I was in the dining room when he came home. We kept a tavern. Saw him first at the bar door that opens from the hall to the bar room. Asked him what was the news from Barrie. He said it was none of my business. He then came into the hall and asked me why I ate my dinner the day before with Coulter and Mrs. McSherry in Barrie. I told him I had done so. Then he followed me into the hall with a cane, and beat me through the hall into the dining-room. He then beat me in the dining-room and told me to go out of doors. I resisted at first, and then he took me by the shoulder and shoved me out of the back door. Then he bolted the door, and I went across the yard and stood by the garden fence. While standing there the servant girl, Elizabeth McFee, and my little daughter came to me. I told my daughter to go into the house lest her father should miss her and whip her. Then I asked Elizabeth where John (the husband) was. She told me he was in the bar-room. She (Elizabeth) advised me to come into the house, and I refused, fearing he would abuse me again. Then Elizabeth went into the house, and I followed after to the kitchen door and stopped there to listen if my husband was inside. I thought I heard his foot in the hall. Then I heard God went round the front way and met Mr. Lawrie at the end of the house. When I got in I went to the dining-room, sat down on the rocking-chair and took my youngest child on my knee. He is about two years old. I was sitting there about five minutes. The servant girl was also in the dining-room with the other two children. My husband then came in and asked me what brought me in, and I did not speak. He then drew his fist and struck me in the face. He then gave me a kick in my right jaw and told me to go out of doors again. When I got off the chair he knocked me down again. Then I arose and went into the kitchen, and he knocked me down there again with his fist. I was crying and screaming at the time. He gave me several kicks while I was down in the kitchen. The children also were screaming. Then he took me by the left shoulder, opened the door and shoved me out. When he shoved me out he gave me a kick with his foot. When he gave me the shove I saw a figure jump from the corner of the kitchen outside, towards my husband. I went about two steps with the shove and fell on my hands and knees. When I recovered myself I looked back, and I saw my husband lying down and Coulter standing over him. I recovered almost at once. The light was on the table in the kitchen and shining through the window, and reflected on Coulter. The kitchen door was open. I could see him clearly; that is the man (meaning the prisoner in the box.) He had something in his hand and struck him (the deceased) twice before I could reach him. I did not notice what he had in his hand. (Counsel then produced a very small axe, and asked if the weapon he (Coulter) then had in his hand was like that one. Witness said no; it looked heavier and larger. Knew the axe now shown, and that it is Coulter's. I have not seen it for as much as two months. He carried it sometimes in his coat pocket and sometimes in his belt. The axe was usually covered by his coat. (Counsel then produced another large axe which had been found near the place with blood on it.) I don't know if that was the weapon he used, it looks more like it than the other. There were two axes near the door—one at the right hand side of the door, quite close to where my husband was lying. I saw that axe before; there is blood on it. Coulter hit him twice with the weapon. After I got up I caught him by the arm. After he had hit the second blow, I said for God's sake Coulter, don't murder him. Then he ran away. He did not speak. I did not notice what he did with the weapon. After the occurrence I went into the kitchen and sat down for a short time—for about five minutes. When I got up I went into the bar and there saw William Lambert and the servant and the children. I told William that my husband was lying at the back door, and to go out and help him. He went out then, and the girl, Elizabeth McFee, went with him. They brought him in, and laid him on the floor. His face was all covered with blood. When he was laid down I told the girl to go up stairs and bring down a bolster or pillow to put under his head. Then I told William Lambert to go over for Mr. Thompson to come and see him. There is no medical man nearer than Barrie. I got water and washed his face. Afterwards Mr. Thompson, Mr. Lawrie and others came in. The occurrence took place about eight o'clock on Saturday night. He died at two o'clock on Sunday. He never spoke but two words after he was hurt. He said, "d—— you, Ashie, come to me," and "d—— you man."

Highway Robbery and Attempt at Murder.

That the town is at this moment infested with villains of the deepest dye, is unquestionable. Acts similar to those which have occurred of late years in the western counties of Canada, are beginning to be enacted in our very midst. The first case we have heard of, was an attempt made upon the Rev. Mr. Bird, an Episcopal Methodist minister, who informed the robber of the profession to which he belonged, and as they are not the richest class of the community, he was allowed to pass. Not so fortunate was poor Frenchman, who had just been robbed of his all, 2s 6d. On Tuesday night the villains became more bold, and attacked several persons. A young man by the name of English was ordered to surrender what loose change he had, but not having any, was allowed to proceed. About nine o'clock the same night near Read's distillery, Thomas Wills, Esq., while proceeding home, observed a suspicious looking man following him, and upon demanding what he wanted, was coolly told "his money;" upon seeing a pistol in the villain's hand, and being unarmed himself, Wills gave leg bail, thereby saving his money and person. About ten o'clock the same night, Mr. John Kerr, while proceeding with his wife to his own residence, in Yeomanville, was met, near Coleman's mills by a ruffian, who planted himself in front of him, and demanded his life or his money. Kerr, thinking it a lark on the part of some of his friends, paid no attention, but on attempting to proceed a pistol was presented to his breast. Kerr at once grappled him by the throat, upon which the villain fired, the ball passing through the rolling part of Kerr's vest, which was very thick, through two shirts, and struck the right breast, breaking the skin and leaving away a small piece of the flesh, but fortunately did no further harm. The effect of the shot was that the villain succeeded in making his escape. Kerr at once followed, and upon nearing him he turned half round and fired again, without taking effect. Kerr not knowing but he had a revolver, and having no weapon himself, gave up the chase. Mr. Kerr's escape was truly miraculous. Nothing should be left undone to discover the miscreants.—Belleville Intelligencer.

TORONTO, Thursday, May 6, 1858.

The same features that have characterized the trade of this city, and of the country generally, for the past six months are those that are still most prominent, and we notice no change except that the dullness and depression are more painfully evident, and that the season of improvement, instead of drawing near, as week after week passes, seems more distant than ever. At the risk of being accused of croaking to an old tune of run and decay, we cannot, with a due regard to truth, represent the present as anything else than the hardest season the commercial men of the country ever experienced, and to give it as our impression, that in the next six months, if a change occurs at all, it will not be for the better. As hard as it may be to make this assertion, and as painful as it is to realize it, yet taking all the circumstances into consideration—the great indebtedness of the country, by five years of overtrading and extravagance,—a poor crop of wheat, for which there is now no market at anything like its comparative value,—a contracted currency to the extent of nearly one-third,—an utter want of capital for the legitimate business of the country,—an internal indebtedness to an immense extent,—a lack of confidence among traders in consequence of the abuse of the credit system,—grevious and vexatious defects in the laws relating to commercial matters,—all these good and sufficient causes, in connection with very unfavourable reports as to the appearance of the growing crop of fall wheat which the frosts of the week past has done much to injure, together with the non-arrival of foreign capital, which it was expected would be sent here for investment, strengthen and confirm the conviction that the dawn of more prosperous days for the country is by no means near. Two sources of relief are certain,—that flowing from the sale of the grain now in the country, and the second the product of the next harvest. Neither of these, however, regarding them at the highest figure, are sufficient in themselves to effect much change, and both together would fall far short of the required amount to set aright the trade of the country. But both sources are dependant on the probability of low prices and a limited and perhaps inferior yield. If it thought that one-third of last years crop is still in the country, an estimate which to say the least is an extreme one, and that the money realized for it would be of great service. We do not doubt it; but taking into consideration the inferior description, the light weight, the waste attendant upon its laying so long in the granary, and the low rates which the best samples command, we cannot hope for very extended sales from this quarter. With respect to the next harvest, while it is of course vain to predict, yet disguise it as we may, the indications, in this neighbourhood especially, point to the conclusion that the yield will not be superior, if equal, to that of last year. Should these ideas be correct, the sources of relief are indeed limited, and by any means cannot be commensurate with the requirements of the country. Nevertheless, the progress of case however slow is sure, and with decreased imports, economical living, and steady production, the time of prosperity, however distant, is certain to arrive.

The transactions in every line of business, during the week has been unusually small. Money continues excessively scarce, and the banks are doing nothing beyond discounting to a limited extent for Exchange on England, and renewing paper maturing on their hands. On the street there is any quantity of notes offering of all short cast at all dates. Transactions in this line are not very large, but it is more owing to the want of confidence on the part of capitalists, than to any objection to the high rates by borrowers that more is not done. The rate at which transactions are consummated is generally 6 per cent per annum, the borrower paying the brokers charge. This enormous rate—two and a half per cent per month.—may well astonish those who are used to the old time of six per cent, but what a contradiction in sommon and every day use is to those of our rulers who so resistantly cling to the absurd usury laws. When will such men see that the attempt to regulate the value of money by law, only results in the evasion of the regulation, and makes it dearer to the unhappy borrower?—Mortgages are very freely offered, and some purchases have been made during the week at 30 per cent. per annum, having five years to run. Seven to eight per cent off the face of the document with the legal interest, is the general rate obtained, and easily too. Country property, even cleared farms with improvements, do not meet with much favour, city property being generally preferred.

Toronto Markets.

SATURDAY, May 8.

The supplies of produce continues small, and produce business generally shares in the depression and dullness incident to this season.

WHEAT.—The market for wheat is without change, outside figure for the best samples being 4s 6d per bushel, the price ranging from that down to 3s 9d for the various grades. There is little or no animation in the market.

FLOUR remains excessively dull with an increasing number of sellers, and a less evident disposition to purchase on the part of buyers.—Prices are very unsettled and we refrain from quoting.

Marine Intelligence.

The propeller St. Lawrence cleared for Quebec on Saturday evening, with a full cargo of flour.

The Ottawa is expected in on Monday morning, with several packages of ship goods, from vessels via the St. Lawrence route. This will be the first arrival of goods via the St. Lawsence this season.

The screw steamer Hunter, Captain Dixon, arrived at Collingwood on Friday evening, the 7th instant, with flour and provisions, equal in capacity to 6,200 barrels, for Montreal—all via Grand Trunk Railroad, except 700 barrels. She also brought 12 passengers.

The Evergreen City had on board, at Chicago, of the 6th instant, a cargo equal to 6,350 barrels of flour, waiting weather to leave. She has luggage also, for same trip, at Milwaukee, 3,041 barrels—in all 9,391 barrels. Some detention in the sailing of the boat was caused by fogs and bad weather. Advices have also been received of the schooner Samuel Hale, both under way to Collingwood, with 4,000 barrels of flour for Montreal.

The captain of the ship Polynesia returned to Quebec last night with the gang of carpenters that he took down to get off his ship, which was stranded last November at Brimichie Point. They had succeeded in floating her off, but were afterwards driven ashore in a worse place, and have abandoned her.

The schooner Mary Grover, from Toronto, with 10,0 0 bushels of wheat to Messrs. Gibb & Bost, arrived here early this morning.

Another attempt was made on Monday to sell the steamship Clyde, as she now lies wrecked on one of the Blugan Islands since August last. She was put up at $100; no advance was offered, and she was consequently withdrawn.

THE GREAT WONDER OF THE AGE.—A NEW ERA DAWNING upon the USERS of PEN and INK. A valuable and wonderful discovery.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK.

An entirely new article, by the discovery of which Pen and Ink are rendered useless. It can be used as a

Writing, Copying, or Indelible Ink

For either of which it can truly be called the ne plus ultra of the kind. For

Writing

It possesses all the beauty of fluid Ink. It is jet black, and so permanent as not to be removed by the strongest oxalic acid. Hence its great value in writing deeds, wills, and other valuable papers. As it will not blot nor crack, it is highly commendable for the use of book-keepers and writers generally. For

Copying,

It works wonderfully. Three, or even four copies can be made at one writing, thus dispensing with the copying machines and the trouble attending it. By a process recently discovered, embroidery patterns, pictures, etc, can be copied accurately on cloth, wood, steel, or any hard substance. For

Printing,

Postmasters and users of stamping apparatus generally value it highly. It matters not how careless the operation, a legible impression is invariably made. Its permanency makes it particularly valuable for stamping clothes.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK

Is put up in packages arranged especially for the travelling community. It can be carried in the pocket, and used at any time. There is no pen required for using it, but it contains in itself everything requisite for persons desiring to correspond with their friends. Every one will find this as represented. As many may be inclined to class the "Portable" as one of the many humbugs of the day, we agree to send a sample package to any one for twenty-five cents, or the same amount in postage stamps. Do you wish for Honourable, Genteel, and Lucrative Employment?

We wish to engage agents for the sale of this celebrated Ink, and can assure all that they will find no better employment or more money-making business than this, and hoping that you will carefully consider it, we await your orders.

TERMS.

To local or travelling agents, we offer the following inducements: For Two Dollars we will send any one two packages of the Ink by mail, and prepay postage on the same; and also we will send full and explicit directions for making, putting up and selling the article.

Any one can make and sell enough to remunerate him for his outlay in a single day.

Pay of the Business.

It is unnecessary to say anything of the money that can be made in this business. It is entirely new and in great demand. Any person can make and put up a thousand packages a day, which will cost three dollars, and which retail at twenty-five cents each, making a profit of two hundred and forty-seven dollars.

☞ No agent will be confined to a single county, but may sell wherever he chooses. You can realize from three to five dollars per day. We wish it understood, that no deviation from the above will be made. Orders solicited.—Address,

ARTIFICIAL STONE.
Patented March, 1857.
Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. ITS BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. ITS DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. ITS CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

WEDNESDAY, May 12.

MR. O'FARRELL EXPELLED.

The first order of the day being read for Mr. O'Farrell to attend in his place, and that member not appearing,

Atty. Gen. CARTIER said—I am about to make a motion of a very unusual character, such as has not been moved since the two Provinces became united. From the evidence adduced with regard to the late Lotbiniere election, there can be no doubt that the sitting member, Mr. O'Farrell, has counselled and aided in certain proceedings which necessitate from this House certain action with regard to him. It has been proved beyond all controversy that during two polling days in the parish of Sylvestre, Mr. O Farrell aided and assisted in divers acts of violence, by which the Deputy Returning Officer, Mr. George Cote, became dispossessed of the poll-book which at that time was in Cote's lawful custody. It was also proved in evidence, that after the closing of the poll, when the Deputy Returning Officer, the Poll Clerk, and other parties met at the priest's house, Mr. O'Farrell advised the Deputy Returning Officer and the Poll Clerk to certify upon oath that the proceedings had been regular, when in fact they had not been so—when he knew that the poll-book had been falsified and did not contain a true statement of the proceedings which took place; and he must have been aware of this fact also; that the oath which was administered to these parties was administered upon a book which was not the Holy Evangelists. If he was not aware that the oath was administered on Moore's Melodies, his conduct was still more blameable, because he must have supposed that the oath was being taken by those parties under all the usual solemn formalities of an oath to facts and circumstances which never existed. I do not intend to discuss Mr. O'Farrell's conduct at any greater length, for I think every member of this House has come to the painful conclusion at which the Government has arrived with regard to him. I move:

"That John O'Farrell, Esq., a member of this House, having unlawfully aided, counselled, and assisted in taking by violence from George Cote, Deputy Returning Officer for the parish of St. Sylvestre, in the County of Lotbiniere, the poll-book used for that parish at the last election held for such County, the said Cote being in lawful possession of such poll-book, and the said John O'Farrell having aided, counselled, and assisted in the injury and falsifying the said poll-book, and the said John O'Farrell having also failed to obey the order of this House, that he should attend in his place this day, be expelled from this House."

Seconded by Atty. Gen. MACDONALD.

Mr. Ross thought that some time should be given to consider this motion, in connection with the evidence, if it were only one day. He scarcely considered it would be decent to adopt so important a motion immediately on its being read. Nor was he altogether satisfied with the motion on hearing it read. He thought it should have contained a stronger case against Mr. O'Farrell to warrant his expulsion. In his opinion the motion did not put the matter so strongly as it might have done. He thought a much graver case might have been made out from the evidence against O'Farrell.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said there could be no graver charge than that of dispossessing the returning officer of the poll-book. The position taken by the hon. member, recalled to his mind the anecdote of an officer who was brought before a King of France to answer for not having fired off a cannon when he should have done so. When called upon to excuse himself, he said, "I had nineteen reasons for not firing the cannon. The first is that we had no powder." The king thought that one reason was sufficient without listening to the rest. So the reasons stated in this motion were amply sufficient for the member's expulsion, without others being adduced.

Mr. PATRICK thought that as the House had declared the sitting member guilty of the most outrageous acts, in addition to the falsifying of the poll books, the member should be imprisoned as well as other persons who had been guilty of similar acts.—The House had been imprisoning less culpable parties who had been the mere tools and victims of the sitting member, and he (Mr. P.) could not see why he, also, should not be imprisoned during the rest of the session. He did not think the House had the power to declare any person ineligible for re-election. The only instance in which that had been done was that of Mr. Wilkes, and in that case the ineligibility had been expunged from the journals.—However if the sitting member were re-elected, he might be expelled again.

Mr. DORION said there were several cases besides that of Mr. Wilkes in which members of the House had been declared ineligible; but that was the last case in the House of Commons and in it the resolutions had been set aside by a large vote, as being a high handed and unjustifiable measure, and it was now admitted on all hands that such a course was not within the proper Province of the House. In Lower Canada two members had been declared ineligible. One of these was Mr. Cross in the latter part of the last century. He was expelled four times, and at last the House had passed an act to make that gentleman ineligible.—That would be the best course to take now if it was intended to make Mr. O'Farrell ineligible. But there was some force in what was said by the member for Grenville that the House had sent to gaol a man of which there was great doubt whether he had any intention of doing wrong. He voted to send that man to gaol because he thought he had shown a culpable degree of weakness, but he did not think him nearly as guilty as Mr. O'Farrell himself. Besides he thought some other steps ought to be taken. There were means of prosecuting before the tribunal, magistrates who swore people upon books other than the Evangelists, and men who falsified the poll book, and caused the returning officer to sign and swear to such book, and who had even forced the returning officer to give it up. He did not think the present resolution went far enough, and believed that in addition the law officers of the Crown ought to be required to adopt criminal proceedings against these persons. He confessed that he did not much like sending people who were acting under the authority of the House to gaol, at the same time he believed it due to the public, to have a thorough judicial inquiry into these cases, and that nothing would be satisfactory other than a trial before the criminal tribunals.

Mr. CONNOR agreed with the observations made by the hon. member for Montreal, and thought it extraordinary that the House should expel a man who after all had no right to his seat, while it imprisoned persons who had been his instruments only, and that for an act which had caused so much excitement in the country. He agreed with the hon. member for Montreal in the point of law, but did not think the member for Peel should have been answered by the Attorney General in the manner in which the latter had replied. The member for Peel wanted to know, for the information of those who entertained a strong feeling on this subject, whether anything beyond the present motion was intended. It would have been more courteous if the hon. Attorney General had answered that inquiry instead of calling on the House to vote at once. All parties in the House were actuated by the same feeling, but he confessed he did not go far enough. Either by this motion, or by one to follow it, the House ought to take a step further, and while it sent the subordinate instruments to gaol, should not fail to mark its sense of the conduct of the sitting member. Far from endeavouring to impede the action of the House, gentlemen on the other side should endeavour to aid in doing justice, and in the hope they would do so, he would risk the question again.

ATTY. GEN. MACDONALD considered that expulsion from that House was punishment of the very gravest kind, and he would not wish to add anything of less importance to it. He would ask, whether for any offence whatever there could be a heavier punishment? And if this were so, it would certainly be a thing in the worst taste to add anything to the vote by which the party was driven from he House. As regard the prosecution of all the guilty parties, he had no doubt that the Attorney General East would take the subject up. It was the duty of every officer of the Crown to see that every offence against the law was brought before the tribunals, and the House might safely leave that in the hands of his hon. friend. As to the imprisonment of the sitting member, too, it was to be remembered that in imprisoning the two men sent to gaol by order of the House, the House had done that which the highest Court had declared to be illegal. For his own part he was ready, no matter what the decision of the Privy Council, to assert the right of the House to punish its own officers; but there was a great difference between these two persons who were officers of the House and Mr. O'Farrell who, though a member of the House, was not its officer. Any decision for imprisoning him was certain to be reversed by the Privy Council. There were two cases in England—one of which he did not hear the name, and the other that of Robinson—and in both cases the vote was the same, one of simple expulsion. It was best then to follow exactly the plan followed in England, where these cases were always well discussed. As to making this person ineligible, it was clear that this House could not deal with it. A statutory enactment declared what persons had the right to sit in one house and the other, and it would be a stretch of power to contravene that law of the land, which had been settled in the case of a party who had been again and again expelled, and yet at last the motion was expunged from the record of the House of Commons.

Dr. CONNOR asked on what ground the Attorney General declared that the House had not the power to commit—whether it was on the ground that the House was only acting like a municipal council under a statute.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said, that in the case of Kerry and Carden, which arose in Newfoundland, it was decided on appeal, that the House of Assembly had not the power to commit, except in cases where that power was necessarily incident to all Legislative bodies—the power of punishing acts of contempt committed on their own purchases. There was a similar decision a very few years ago, in respect to the House of Assembly of Tasmania, which had a constitution just like that of Canada. It was held on that occasion that the lex et Parliamentarii did not apply to Provincial Parliaments. In that case, a Mr. Hampton had refused to appear and give evidence. He was, therefore, taken into custody; and the local courts sustained the rights of the House of Assembly to commit; but the Privy Council decided that the Assembly had no such power. He was in favor of declaring by a solemn enactment that all the powers possessed by the House of Commons by the lex et consuetudo Parliamentaria, should belong to the Provincial Parliament.

Mr. D. ROSS conceived that the Provincial Parliament possessed all the powers exercised by the House of Commons.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said, the only effect of passing such a resolution as that of imprisonment would be to give rise to an action in what damages would be recovered from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BELLINGHAM said, the reason for the decision in the Tasmania case was that the House constituted by imperial authority had imprisoned a superintendent of convicts appointed by Imperial authority, who was commissioned in his capacity of superintendent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTTE reminded the House that the Attorney General did not urge the law point as his principal reason of objecting to imprisonment, although he mentioned that as a further reason, and far from abandoning the acquired right of the Parliament of this country, the Attorney General was disposed to secure it by the passing of an Act.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER then intimated to the House that the Government would resist any motion for the issue of a new writ for the county of Lotbiniere until an act should have been passed for disfranchising that parish which had been the cause of the mischief.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND was opposed to disfranchising any place, whatever, and warned the House that if this remedy were adopted in one case, it must be extended to a great many others.

Mr. DORION also thought there was a difficulty about disfranchising any place. In England this was only done for the offence of bribery. He had more faith in passing a law to secure a fair election.

The conversation then dropped.

Hudson's Bay Territory.

LONDON, 30th April, 1858.

The attention of commercial men in this country is now being directed to the resources of the Hudson's Bay Territories in such a way as will, I hope, inspire Canada to active, but friendly rivalry. The country is so large, and its resources are so numerous and diversified, that all the spare cash of both England and Canada may find advantageous employment within its wide area. Just as there is room enough for all peacefully disposed agriculturists, whose highest ambition is to cultivate their own farm, and live beneath the shade of their own vine and fig tree in the territory of the Saskatchewan or the Red River, so also there is scope enough for those more adventurous spirits who may desire to participate in the danger and excitement of the fur trade, or to engage in the equally exciting and no less lucrative pursuits of whale-fishing. The advantages which the mouth of Mackenzie's River affords in this latter respect, have often been pointed out in your columns, and were strikingly portrayed before the Select Committee of the House of Commons. In that part of the Arctic Sea there exist the most splendid whale fisheries in the world. The Americans are deriving from this source alone an annual revenue amounting to several times more than the entire value of the Company's fur trade throughout the whole of their territories. Why should they be permitted to enjoy a monopoly of this great spring of national wealth? But apropos to the whale fisheries, it should not be forgotten that Mackenzie's river, which is navigable the whole way to the Great Slave Lake, contains a very valuable salmon fishery, while the surrounding country is rich in deposits of salt, mineral tar, iron ore, and many other minerals. The Hudson's Bay monopoly must not be allowed to interfere with the opening up of the important part of the Company's territories to English and Canadian enterprise. I hope, therefore, that the Canadian Legislature will require, as Mr. Christy sought to do in his minority report, that Canada shall be equally as free to occupy the Mackenzie River districts, as she will be to occupy the territory of the Saskatchewan or the Red River. That this subject has occupied the attention of other persons in this country besides myself, is obvious from the annexed prospectus of an "Arctic Fishery and Exquimaux Fur Trading Company," which has not been very long published. It appears to me to contain a perfectly feasible project, and one which, if it were wisely prosecuted, could not fail amply to repay those who might be induced to invest their capital in it. The representative of the company in America will probably be Captain Kennedy of Toronto, whose Arctic experiences, and practical knowledge of whale fisheries, as well as whose cool courage and sagacity, eminently qualify him for the position. The following is a copy of the prospectus:—

"The Company has been formed for the purpose of prosecuting on the north-west ern, and subsequently on the eastern shores, of the North American Continent, the whale, walrus, and seal fishery, and also of combining therewith a trade with the natives, in marten, sable, fox, and other peltry, which are known to abound in vast quantities. In prosecuting this Fishery this Company proposes to equip and despatch a small, but efficient number of ships, to the North Pacific Ocean. The enormous profits of the Americans to the north of Behring Strait, within the last two years, may be estimated by the following extract from the address of the late Rear-Admiral F. W. Beachey, at the anniversary meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, held on the 26th May, 1856:—"I need hardly remind you of the report from the Secretary of the United States Navy to the Senate, to the effect, that in consequence of information derived from one of our Arctic expeditions to Behring Strait, a trade had sprung up in America, by the capture of whales to the north of that Strait, of more value to the States than all the commerce with what is called the East! and that in two years there had been added to the national wealth of America, from this source alone, more than eight millions of dollars, or £1,600,000 sterling. This would alone justify the competitory adventure of the Company. Notwithstanding the success attained, we have made no attempt worthy of our national reputation for commercial energy and enterprise, in those waters. The outlay in this department will be regulated and sanctioned by the Shareholders. But the new feature of this undertaking, and that which undoubtedly will become its main and most largely remunerative branch, is the prosecution of the whale fishery, on the plan suggested by the distinguished Arctic navigator, Lieut. Bedford Pim, by which the very great risk and expense of a Polar navigation will be avoided.

"It is proposed to establish coast or block houses on one or more convenient spots (which it is not considered prudent as yet to specify precisely;) these are to be capable of accommodating a sufficient number of men, who will be fed, clothed, and paid by the company, under articles of service similar to the Whaling Seaman's contract. Numerous whale-boats, with the best and most approved apparatus will be always in readiness, for the purpose of catching the whales as they fly for refuge in vast numbers, round Point Barrow; and the localities are well ascertained where they may be easily caught in open boats by the people from the block-houses. The fish will be brought to the beach, where there is abundance of drift wood for fuel; and the oil extracted ashore (a great advantage,) and stored, until at the proper season, the stock can be carried away by the Company's vessels, which will proceed through Behring Strait directly upon the opening of the ice, and before the American can arrive at the grounds, and convey the oil and bone to a market in China, India, Australia, or the west coast of South America, &c., where prices for these articles rule higher than at home. This plan of operation will, by its economy, certainty and despatch, double the revenue of the Company, so far as its fisheries are concerned; and, as the natives must pass by the proposed settlements on their way to dispose of their furs to the Russians, the peltry trade, extending over an immense district, will thus fall into the hands of the Company, instead of, as at present, being monopolised by the Russians.

Here it may be remarked that the Esquimaux, though a docile people, are sunk in the lowest depths of heathenism; so that, by the formation of a depot, it would afford the Company every facility in assisting, while pursuing its own legitimate objects, and labors of the Christian Missionary, and be the means perhaps, of spreading enlightenment among them. The Shares have been purposely fixed at a low rate to arrest the attention of our maritime population—more especially the investments of spare capital and savings on the part of the whalers, mariners, and fishermen at our shipping ports, to whose applications for Shares a preference will be invariably given. A portion of the capital will be laid out in Ships and their equipment, for fishing in the North Pacific; and the principal amount of the capital as circumstances may determine, in block-houses, whaling and fur-trading stations. The estimates for both will of course receive the sanction of a general meeting."

Leaving this great scheme to the consideration of Canadian merchants and capitalists, I have at present only one or two more facts to communicate. The first is that the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, the most influential commercial body in England, have presented an admirable petition to the House of Commons in favor of the total abolition of the Hudson's Bay monopoly. The second is that preparations are being made to go up to Lord Derby with a powerful deputation, of members of parliament, and the representatives of public bodies, who advocate a similar settlement of the Hudson's Bay monopoly. I hope that the Canadian public will be stimulated by these examples to renewed activity. —Toronto Globe's Correspondence.

Topics of the Day.

The topic of the day, or of the year, perhaps of the period, is the acquittal of Dr. Bernard. Of the justice of the verdict, as a fact, there cannot be a doubt. He was accused of complicity in a murderous attack, of which it cannot be shown that he had the slightest foreknowledge. As regards the death of poor Battie, of course, it is not imagined that Dr. Bernard had any evil intentions towards him; and jury, like the public, seem, in spite of the wording of the indictment, to have attended only to the substance of the charge, and to have considered whether or not this avowed conspirator had conspired against the life of the French Emperor, or the "Despot," as Mr. Edwin James says. Let us here observe that the bold Bernard confessed his calling after the verdict had been delivered, and not before—a piece of caution which cannot be too highly praised. Directly a jury allow their judgment to be materially influenced by their feelings, the verdict ceases to depend upon the evidence; and it is just as likely that they will decide against a prisoner on the ground that he is a red-republican, as that they will acquit him because he is the enemy of despotism.

Accordingly, Dr. Bernard's prudence cannot be too highly commended. For our part, we are glad Dr. Bernard is acquitted; in the first place, because there is a link wanting in the evidence, which tended to prove his guilt; in the second, because, that link being absent, the verdict of acquittal will raise us in the eyes of foreign nations. Their opinion is not worth much, ignorant as they are of our manners and institutions; but if, upon sufficient evidence, we had convicted Bernard, they would have been mean enough to suspect us of truckling to Louis Napoleon, and probably now that we have acquitted him, they will venture to assert that he is let off merely from bravado. There are good ices in Paris, and excellent brass-bands in Austria, and learned Professors in Prussia, but the idea of legality is a thing that exists in England, and cannot be found on the Continent; and, consequently, it is absurd to suppose that the case of Bernard will be understood there, either by our enemies or our friends. As usual, it is from our friends that we most especially pray to be saved; for those who love England, or some ideal country which they choose to call England, will inevitably declare (where there no spies at hand) that we acquitted a professed seditionist, and probably assassin, in order to show that we cared just as little for those hundred thousand bayonets as if there was no insurrection in India, and no war in China. We are afraid that there are many in England even who are of that opinion, but by publishing it they tend to throw discredit on the English name. Bernard was acquitted because the evidence did not prove his guilt. Probably the jury rejoiced that the testimony was defective; but no Englishman can doubt but that they would have convicted the prisoner if his criminality had been clearly established. The verdict was not a Welsh verdict of "serve him right," but the accused having been lawfully acquitted, every canon of appeal that the remote chance of the prosecution has been rightly served. There is no danger of the present case of Englishmen ever being disturbed to by a foreign Power, and for that reason we object the more strongly to the verdict in the case of Bernard being ascribed a sort of know-nothingism on the part of the jury. They were glad to have an excuse for acquitting the prisoner, and the public outside were naturally delighted with the result, but that is all that can be said. As for Dr. Bernard, who confesses that he has deliberately gone into the general conspiracy line of business, we have, of course, no sympathy with him individually. We know that he wants to destroy, but we have not yet heard what he purposes to build up, and we deny altogether his right as a Frenchman to interfere in the affairs of Italy.

As to the liberation of Italy from the infamous tyranny of Austria, that is altogether a different question. Of course no Power will interfere for the sake of that poor country, unless Austria happens some day to go to war with England or France; and in the latter case the French, instead of occupying Rome alone, would probably seize Venice and Milan as well. It appears to us that Italy is entitled to a sympathy which is altogether wanted on the French; for whatever Paris may say, France chose its tyrant, and the French army is as national an army now as it ever was and by no means a police force, as is sometimes stated. Italy, however, is a conquered and oppressed country. The Italian nobles will not attend the balls of the Viennese officials; there is one side of every cafe for the Austrians, and another for the natives; the best seats at the principal Italian theatres are set apart for the army of occupation—in fact there is a line of separation everywhere between the indignant inhabitants and the foreign agents of brute force.

But much as we may deplore the state of things in Italy, it is not the province of England to set this go right in that unfortunate country. We must even keep on good terms with Austria, just as a respectable man meets his neighbor in society and bows to him although perfectly aware that the latter has made his fortune by speculating too freely with the money of his orphan ward, who is endeavoring but in vain to get possession of her own property.

As regards one portion of Italy—Sardinia—something might be done, but that little our Government is not disposed to do. After promising our support to the Sardinians against Naples, we appear to be shuffling out of our real implied engagement. It will not, it is true, injure us in any material sense if we treat with contempt the representatives of this liberal and patriotic state. "Nothing will be lost," to reverse the words of Francis the First, "except honor," but that is more than the richest country can afford to dispense with. —Illustrated London Times.

The Budget.

That is a bold man who faces the House of Commons in the character of a Chancellor of the Exchequer with a deficiency in the revenue to be provided for. It is not the ordinary curiosity to see how a Minister will get out of a difficulty, which a measure of importance may involve, which influences the mind and enchains the attention of that decorously eager assembly on the night of the delivery of a Budget. A hundred loopholes may be found out of which a Minister may creep when he has to deal with any other kind of duty; but it is the sternest of all necessities which is fastened upon him when he has to make up the national balance-sheet. This very critical—for numerous and obvious reasons more than usually critical—emergency Mr. Disraeli has met with an ingenuity and a skill which have produced a success which might be positively dangerous, but for the fact that just so much of stringency has been introduced into his financial plan as will afford scope for that peculiarly English safety valve—grumbling. On its face, without doubt, the Budget is open to the criticism that it is founded on the very principle of which the early part of the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was an elaborate condemnation—namely, that of borrowing with one hand in order to pay with the other. In the strict sense of the term, we admit he does not borrow; but, by postponing payment of debts, he renews them—a state of things which plain people cannot refine into an absolute liquidation. It is, however, neither generous nor wise to demand a too rigid adherence to principles, of which he may be an abstract disciple, of a Finance Minister who has to give to a present and positive deficit of four millions the enchantment and the charm of distance; and if he can effect that half-visionary object, he does something which is not without merit, and considerable merit too.—Without questioning the philosophy of postponement of the evil day is not a grand or a dignified one; but it is a philosophy nevertheless, and not without a strong practical vein running through it. We most of us know the story of the astute Persian malefactor who obtained a remission of his sentence for a year on his undertaking to teach the Shah's favorite dog to speak within that time. His reasoning showed that although he had promised to perform an impossibility, yet there were several chances in his favour; for within the given time the Sultan might die, the dog might die, or he himself might die, while, if none of these contingencies turned up, he would at least have gained twelve months of life. Some such process of reasoning and of action is going on every day in the minds of ninety-nine out of every hundred men who are moving in the midst of the changes and chances of the world; and it would be hard to deny the right to avail himself of it to a Minister of Finance who has to deal with that abhorrent incident—a vacuum in the Exchequer.

An analytical examination of Mr. Disraeli's Budget is well calculated to give us some notion of the vastness and the complication of the machinery with which a Chancellor of the Exchequer has to deal. The starting-point of the consideration is, in itself appalling—namely, the expenditure of a great nation, which there is not, and cannot if it would, yield one tithe of its claim in guarantee. The supposition almost shrinks from the idea of the necessity of providing a sum of fifty-three to meet the inevitable expenses of one year. A comparison of that amount with the demand for twelve months' means merely of paying our way, twenty years ago, again must cause us to pause. But the comfort and the consolation come in the shape of the knowledge that the expansion of expenditure is only commensurate with the expansion of our national greatness and our commercial prosperity, evidenced in the present instance by the fact that soon after the close of a most expensive war, and in the year after a remission of £9,000,000 of taxation, we find our revenue reaching to nearly £63,000,000, and this, too, immediately after the passage of our monetary affairs through the ordeal of a panic of unparalleled severity. A little delicate manipulation of the deficiency was all that was required to restore us to a complacency to which a consciousness of national strength not unnaturally inclines us. It would not have been very surprising to any one if we had found the Minister venturing to arrest the fall of the rate of the Income tax, to which, by operation of law, we are entitled this year; and it is creditable to Mr. Disraeli's nerve that he has been able to resist that temptation. A remission of the war sinking fund and of the payment of the Exchequer Bonds now coming payable, so far on the road to posterity as 1862 and 1863, may be a violation of strict principle, but it is not, on the whole, disagreeable to those to whom a payment of sevenpence in the pound, instead of fivepence, on their incomes was the alternative. There is, of course, something approaching to meanness and selfishness on our discounting the future; but it is one of those pleasant wrongs which a Frenchwoman has declared to be irresistible. Three millions and a half of the deficit thus swept into the corner of five years hence; the remaining half-million is not unadroitly provided for by the equilization of the duties on spirits. There are moralists of a very comprehensive description who would tell you that no duty could be too exorbitant on such an article as spirits, but even the most moderate thinkers on social questions would be inclined to admit that they are a legitimate subject of taxation; while, if it be really the fact, as stated by Mr. Disraeli, that the imposition of a heavy duty on spirits produces the abnormal result of advantage to the revenue, increased consumption, and diminution of illicit distillation, why, the case is complete, and so is the supply of the deficiency. The argument for the creation of a surplus besides, although it may appear spacious, and to savour rather of a desire to add something of the ornamental to the Budget, if founded on a very proper financial principle; and, if the imposition of a stamp on cheques may be said to fall upon a comparatively exceptional class, there is compensation in the satisfaction which every gentleman must feel who is in a position to indulge in the luxury of a banker. The surplus thus provided, added to the balance in the Exchequer, makes a decent and respectable provision for the coming year, and we may congratulate the Finance Minister on having satisfactorily set his house in order until next Spring; for, looking to the absence of salient points of objection in the Budget and the temper in which it was received by the House, a safe and easy passage may be predicted for his plan.

In delivering himself of the strictly practical financial scheme, as we have already indicated, Mr. Disraeli did not wholly abstain from indulging in some abstract disquisition on the theory which should guide Chancellors of the Exchequer; and he even hinted at a revision and a reconsideration of expenditure and taxation, with a view to those promises of payment of liabilities now due some few years hence by means of the postponement of which he has been enabled to supply his present deficit, and to accomplish the rigid adherence to the compact for the entire abolition of the Income-tax in 1860, which will probably be the main ingredient in any popularity which the Budget may attain. If to the duty he proposes to devote himself, it must be in a more practical and searching spirit than that which is evinced by vague declarations of hopes of the revenue being brought up by the requirements of the day by the ordinary operations of national prosperity, even though minus the Income-tax and the sum necessary to pay off the War Sinking Fund and the Exchequer Bonds. It is not unworthy of inquiry whether an examination of our existing imposts could not prove many of them to possess an elasticity and a capability of augmentation which at present they do not patently exhibit. It is not an unreasonable, if it is not a wholly admitted, axiom in finance that property should be made the basis of taxation. The product of some of our existing duties on property is notoriously inadequate to their actual springs and sources. For instance, there is a constant evasion of the Legacy and Succession Duties, which a little of that stringency which is applied to the working of the Income-tax would tend considerably to remove, and the result of which would be no mean accession to the revenue. It is not impossible that any Government which takes on itself the readjustment of taxation will have to seek new sources of revenue, and in doing so it will do well to endeavour to discover some which will afford the best chance of avoiding that fluctuation which is inevitably attendant on duties derivable from trade and commerce, and what may be called the floating prosperity of the country. In the course of the discussion on the Budget there were fewer volunteers in suggestion to the Chancellor of the Exchequer than usual, and there was only one hint at a plan for future taxation which was remarkable. That particular suggestion appeared to the House to be somewhat startling; but it is understood not to be a mere whimsical theory, but the result of much thought, and a somewhat elaborate calculation, and that is the idea of the imposition of a rate of a penny in the pound on all tangible property, at decreasing periods. It is affirmed with confidence that such an impost would produce a sum which would not at first fall far short of Finance Ministers, and cause deficits to be things of the past. Novelties in politics and finance now-a-days have to encounter that opposition of incredulity which used to characterize the reception of discoveries in science and mechanics, but, in reference to these latter, it has ceased to be disregarded because they are remarkable; and it may be that some day or other we may induce even a Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House of Commons not to call a innovation with impracticability or impossibility.

The Mutiny in India.

From the Illustrated London Times.

We have received our letters and papers from Bombay to March 24. We give from the Bombay Standard of that date the following summary of events in Oude, the main, if not the sole, point of interest at present:—

THE OPERATIONS AT LUCKNOW.

Our narratives consist in part of rehearsals, the meagre outline formerly given by telegraph being now filled up from our correspondence—the latest tidings being once more given from telegraphic notices merely to be filled up by some future mail. Lucknow is now in our possession, and our troops will speedily have every stronghold in Oude in their hands. The heaviest portion of our bloody task is completed, and we are now exchanging the attributes of destroyers and avengers for those of reconstructors, restorers, and protectors.

We mentioned two mails back the general movement in advance between the 3rd and 6th of March. It is within the past six days that letters have given details beyond the 7th. The force under General Outram, which at this date crossed the Goomtee, consisted of Walpole's division, with thirty pieces of field artillery and 2000 cavalry, under Sir Hope Grant. Though under the fire of the enemy's guns at the Martiniere and other positions, no effective opposition was offered. Two pontoon bridges had been erected beforehand in the direction of Beebepore. The Commander-in-Chief and staff were present on the occasion. General Outram now entered on a very careful and leisurely reconnoissance of the country between the bridge and the villages of Chinnut. He was closely watched by the scouts, hanging like clouds on our left flank. Leaving the village on the left, they advanced along the Fyzabad road for about three miles, intending, after they had selected their camping-ground, to make a detour to the right, and reconnoitre Maryon, the old Lucknow cantonments, where the enemy were said to have two divisions. Before this could be accomplished, we were attacked by the enemy, who were driven off with considerable loss. We suffered little, but Major Smith, of the Queen's Bays, was amongst the slain. On attempting a further movement a second attack was made upon us. It was now late in the day. The men had been under arms, when it was resolved to rest for the night: the force bivouacked on the battle-field which proved so disastrous on the 30th June.

Early next morning (7th) the enemy again made their appearance, but, after an half hour's fighting were driven off, numbers being cut up by the 9th Lancers. Outram now took possession of the Chukkur Kothi, or King's Race-house; but, as this post was commanded by the enemy's guns, it was not meant to be maintained until after a breaching battery against the city had been established. In the afternoon a further attack was made upon us, with the usual results.

On the 8th the Commander-in-Chief visited Outram, to see how matters went on. The further reconnoissances was now committed to General Hope Grant, who made a wide sweep to the north-east, but encountered no resistance. In his absence the enemy attacked Outram in great force. They were driven off, but not without considerable loss on our side.

On the 9th Sir James Outram carried the Chukkur Kothi, with all buildings and gardens around, effectually turning and enfilading the enemy's first great line of works. Our principal casualties occurred in pursuing the troops through dark rooms and passages, who, when they saw our men approaching, shot them down before they were aware of their danger.

On the 10th Outram's division, with the exception of the artillery, enjoyed an exemption from their labours, to leave Sir Edward Lugard time to pass on from the other side of the town. Our heavy guns kept thundering on the city. The Martiniere had been stormed the previous day by the second division, under the gallant officer just named. On the 10th Bank's House and the Residency were captured in the face of a very obstinate resistance. He was now close on Begum's Palace and Hurbut Gunge, within 200 yards of the Kaiserbagh. Here amongst others, Major Hodson, who had distinguished himself with the Guide Corps all the night the cannon fell mortally wounded.

On the 11th, while the force on the Alumbagh side kept pressing on, two columns, one under Outram and Walpole, moved out, sweeping to the right of the cantonments as far as the Ghun Ghur, near Moosebagh, and returning by the iron bridge. The left column pushed directly for this latter structure. Our front was considerably advanced. The enemy are said to have lost 400 or 500. On our side, Captain Cooper, of the Engineers; Captain Muorsom, her Majesty's 52nd; and Lieutenant McDonald, of the 93rd, fell.

On the 12th the Commander-in-Chief took the Immumbarra, close to the Kaiserbagh, when a heavy fire was directed on the last named building, both from Sir Colin Campbell's and Sir James Outram's forces. The whole was captured about nine o'clock on the morning of the 13th, after a severe contest of some hours.

On the 16th Outram was occupied in carrying the portion of the town between the iron bridge and the Residency. The people were now streaming from the city in a north-westerly direction, making, as it was supposed, for Rohilcund. On the morning of the 17th Brigadier Campbell, with a strong force of cavalry and horse artillery, was ordered to proceed from Alumbagh in p ed from the farther side of the river to intercept those endeavouring to escape eastwards. A little leisure was now afforded to examine the havoc that had been made. Nothing could be more terrible or astonishing. The strength of the enemy's works would have been considered incredible had we not seen them. They were literally shivered to pieces by our shot and shell. The Kaiserbagh was strewed with musket balls.

Thus far our letters extend, stopping where the electric telegraph closed on us a week ago.

We now fall back on the casual notices supplied to us betwixt the 14th and the 21st at which date our latest tidings close. It has been ascertained at the dates already quoted, that Mrs. Orr, whose infant had shortly before been sent into the camp from the districts where it had been kept concealed, and Miss Jackson, had been removed from the Queen's Palace, and placed, through the influence of Maun Singh, in a private residence beyond the power of Dunkar or rench of the mutineers.

On the 16th both the brigades were secured, and the troops advancing occupied the Machee Bhawun and Great Imaumbarra. Large bodies of the enemy had crossed the stone bridges before they could be attacked by Sir James Outram. A Goorkah division the same evening captured the enemy's position in front of the Alumbagh, seven guns falling into their hands.

On the 19th the last post held by the enemy was stormed, and they themselves pursued by the cavalry, when numbers were cut up. The city was now completely in our possession, 117 guns had been seized, and not a single post left in the hands of the rebels to be defended. Amongst the auspicious events of the day was the recovery of Mrs. Orr and Miss Jackson. They had been rescued by Captain Marshall and Lieutenant Boree, of the Artillery, with a small party of Gookahs, by whom they had been conveyed to the camp of Jung Bahadoor. They had latterly been in charge of by Meer Wajee Ali Darogah, by whom they had been respectfully and kindly treated. The triumphs of war hardly closed when the labours of peace were entered on. The most stringent orders had been given to avoid indiscriminate violence or slaughter. The panic-stricken citizens, who had been assured by the Durbar and mutineers that the whole population of Lucknow was doomed to one indiscriminate slaughter, were endeavouring to make their escape in all directions, when they were met by the artisans, labourers, cultivators, of whose villages Outram had taken charge, loud in their admiration of our kindness and forbearance. They said that not one village or hamlet had been injured, unless such as had afforded refuge to the rebels; and that our soldiers had interposed to protect the sick, the weak, the aged, and the women and children from injury. The townspeople began to take heart, and return to their houses and resume their ordinary occupations. The Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief, still in the thickest of the strife, are making municipal arrangements, organising a garrison of moderate size for Lucknow, preparing with the remainder of the troops to scour the Doab and Rohilcund, once more infested with the enemy, and to operate against Bareilly, Calpee, Jhansi, and Kotah, which we have hitherto been compelled, from want of men, to leave alone. The conduct of our men has throughout been distinguished in an extraordinary degree by that humanity which is the natural charracteristic of the brave. Private soldiers have risked their lives in searching through the burning ruins of villages, from which the enemy could only be driven by fire, to save those from destruction otherwise unable to escape. When strayed children have been picked up by them, they have been carried about and nursed and cared for by them as if they had been their own. That the terrible vengeance which has been, and is being, executed on the mutineer should have frequently descended on the heads of the innocent was a thing inevitable, unless the guilty were to be suffered to go free. With Englishmen only was it possible to have been so little frequent as it has been.

Provincial Parliament.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

FRIDAY, 14th May.

COBOURG DEBENTURES.

Hon. SIDNEY SMITH moved the second reading of the Bill to legalize By-laws and Debentures of the Town of Coburg and for other purposes.

Mr. BROWN said the Bill had only this moment been distributed. He did not think it was one of a kind that should be passed without ample time for consideration, and for allowing the people of Cobourg to express their opinion on it. For his own part he distinctly objected to passing any Bill to render valid or to invalidate any Debentures which were not set forth therein. In other cases similar Bills had rendered Debentures valid, which the House would never have rendered valid, had they known what Debentures were pointed at. The second clause gave the Town of Cobourg power to raise more money,, though at this moment they were unable to pay their present debts to the Government. The third clause imposed certain charges to rank in a certain order on the tolls of the Harbor. How did they know what other charges they might be interfering with by this? The fourth clause stated how the Sinking Fund was to be appropriated. How did they know what other charges they might thus be cutting off? It was altogether an exceedingly loose Act, and one which should not be allowed to be hastily put through.

Hon. S. SMITH said the Bill was drawn up by Mr. Hillyard Cameron, one of the first lawyers in the Province, and the whole proceedings had taken place in consequence of that gentleman's advice that the By-laws were illegal. He had no objection to insert in the Bill, in committee, a list of the Debentures which would be affected by it.

The Bill was then read a second time on a division, and referred to the Private Bills' Committee.

EMIGRANT LAWS.

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the law relating to Emigrants. The hon. gentleman briefly repeated the explanation of its provisions, which he had given on the occasion of introducing the Bill.

Mr. McGEE said he had paid a good deal of attention to the subject with which this Bill proposed to deal, and to this Bill he had paid particular attention. He should be very happy—bearing in mind the facts which had come to the knowledge of the public in reference to the emigration to the St. Lawrence—if he thought this was such a measure as during this session of Parliament they should rest content with passing. He did not question that there was some good in the Bill, but the good appeared to him to be so attenuated, and the improvement so small, that he regretted the attention of Parliament should be called to the subject at all, especially by the Government, unless a more substantial step, a more genuine improvement were proposed. Without any desire to be hypercritical or to show any personal disrespect to the author of the present measure, he must say that this appeared to him to be one of the smallest measures of legislative experiment which had ever fallen under his notice. The first object proposed was to make the tax uniform on infants and adults, by imposing a tax of 5s instead of 3s 9d on infants under 14 years of age, as well as on adults. This was a small affair to legislate upon, and it would at the same time operate injuriously on many a parent, who brought out half a dozen healthy children, afterwards to be the wealth producers of the country. As regarded the revenue, he had calculated that the whole difference of revenue this would have made on last year's emigration at Quebec, would have been £350. He would much rather have the tax on children under 14 years of age done away with altogether. The second object of the Bill was to impose a penalty on masters of vessels and seamen for nonobservance of the laws of the country from which they came, or for breach of contract with the emigrant on his passage. It was provided that a penalty might be imposed, not less than $20 or more than $100, independently of the remedy which the party aggrieved might have. This was a desirable improvement, but he did not see that the right provision was made for carrying it out. The breach of contract was to be established by those who had been parties or witnesses to it, but how were these parties to be retained in Quebec? They wished to hurry westward, to engage immediately in remunerative labor, and, glad to escape out of the hands of the tyrant who had abused his power over them on the voyage, they could not be got to stay to prosecute him. He thought it would be better to provide that the Emigration agent should be the avenger of the wrongs of such parties. The next object of the Bill was to provide for sending back the infirm, lunatic, idiotic, blind, deaf, and dumb. The provisions it made in reference to this class, he conceived, were quite impracticable. It provided that the passage-money and bonds lodged with the Chief Emigration Agent at Quebec, should be refunded on the receipt of certificates from the Emigration Agents or British Consuls at the ports to which those parties were returned, that they had arrived there. Now the fact was there were unfortunately no Emigration Agents at European ports, except at Liverpool, and perhaps Hamburg. And as regarded Consuls, he questioned whether they could be thus made amenable to Colonial laws. The improvement introduced by the Bill was of so little importance, that it was very difficult to see any appreciable difference between where they stood now and where they would be, if this Bill became law. Another clause related to runners, a class of men whom it was most necessary to bring under the supervision of the law. In some countries in ancient times they punished offences committed against strangers in a two-fold manner—they first punished the offence in relation to its own intrinsic magnitude, and then they punished it in addition as an offence against the law of hospitality. He thought it would be a wise provision to punish offences committed against newly landed emigrants, who were peculiarly liable to be imposed upon, beyond the measure of punishment which would be extended to similar offences, if committed by one resident against another. This Bill provided that no one should act as a runner without a license, for which a sum not exceeding $100 per annum should be paid to the corporation; and that besides, every runner should give security for his good behaviour to the amount of $300. If that was a sufficient security, he did not see why the runner should have to pay $100 additional for his license. It would only operate to make him wring that amount out of the emigrants by his rapacity, in addition to the ordinary profits which he would otherwise make out of them. Perhaps it might be said that these were details which had best be considered in committee. But the Bill was entirely made up of details. There was no principle in it. He believed that the House had usually felt disinclined to take any part in encouraging emigration, because they entertained the not unreasonable fear that if they did so, they might be instrumental in bringing persons to this country who would be a burden to it instead of being useful to it. But surely there were men who had agencies which might be relied upon to give true information which would tend to procure a fitting population for the Province. He did not believe indeed that this object could be accomplished by the blind puffing of an ignorant journal published in London and subsidized by the Government, apparently rather to abuse party men than for any other purpose. It was not by such means as these that proper information was to be procured. The United States were somewhat known in England, but Canada very little at all. Three years ago last spring he visited Europe, and being in some of the towns of Yorkshire and Lancashire, as well as in those of Ireland, he was sometimes asked to address audiences there. Thinking, therefore, that there was no subject on which a person who had lived so long in America, could speak more properly than on the fortunes of those countrymen of his hearers who had settled on that continent. He made emigration his topic. He found great ignorance of Canada in England, no less than in Ireland; but less in Scotland, probably on account of the number of Scottish settlers in this country. Many——and these not always among the more ignorant classes—believed that Canada was a country covered with snow during the greater part of the year; that people had sometimes to get out of their houses in the morning through the first floor windows; and that men—like the Baron Munchausen—tied their horses to steeples over night and found them hung to the church vane in the morning. The Exhibitions at London and Paris were the first things to call attention to Canada and prove that it was something of a country. The great hives of emigrants at present were the British Isles and Germany. The British Islands, with 30,000,000 of people, and Germany with 40,000,000, with all their lands taken up, with distinctions of classes, and social difficulties of various kinds would be for years to come, during the lives of the present generation, and after the present generation, the great feeders of population for the American continent. The effort of a wise Canadian statesman then would be directed—not to put an additional capitation tax on infants of fourteen years of age—but to procure a productive emigration, and discourage a useless emigration to the Canadian shores. An incident which occurred in the year 1856 showed that the province had not yet devised the best means of bringing into Canada a superior class of settlers. He spoke of the fact that 6,000 or 8,000 Norwegians, who arrived at Quebec, and were sent entirely through the province without stopping at all. It appeared that a certain Sir Something Rooney, hearing that there were a number of Norwegians likely to leave for America, started himself for Stockholm and made a contract to give them through tickets by the Grand Trunk. These people came in at one end of the line and went out at the other. He considered it was a disgrace to the country that 6,000 or 8,000 emigrants, with perhaps $100,000 among them, should thus have gone from end to end of Canada, and not to have been once informed that there were any cultivable lands where they could make a home. They went through to Minnesota, where certainly the climate was as inclement as that of Canada, and so they passed on 2,500 miles beyond the seaboard, instead of settling on the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence, where it was possible for men of small means, but large industry, to work out a competency for themselves and their families. The remedy for this evil was to sift the emigration before it left its homes—to convey information to the German emigrants before they came to the village inn, where they chose their captains. Very systematically did these Germans plan their expeditions, and he had met them on Lake Erie with their little stock of provisions, packed in Germany, still bolding out, so accurately had they calculated what would be necessary for their purposes. If this information was to be afforded, it must be done by responsible agents making regular returns to the Government—perhaps to the Agricultural Bureau, which seemed to have taken the matter under its care; though a drowsy care it certainly seemed to be. He thought there should be three emigrant agents, one at Liverpool, one at Hamburg, and one at Havre. He wished the thing were under the charge of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, for then he believed that there would be a more worthy scheme; but he would call the attention of that hon. gentleman to the fact that there was a considerable French emigration. Since the United States had begun their regular statistics of emigration, 188,000 emigrants had arrived at New York from France. 100,000 emigrants had also settled in Algeria, so that the ordinary argument that there was no emigration from France was not true. He found that the press in the city of the hon. Commissioner of the Board of Works, were already showing how much that gentleman was to be praised and applauded for the great zeal and labor which he was showing in respect to the matter of emigration. Well he (Mr. McGee) confessed that the Bill was good as far as it went, only the misfortune was that it did not go at all.

Mr. FERRES said that the gentleman from Montreal had proved one thing very effectually, and that was that he was himself a very fit person to be an emigrant agent. As to the rest, though the hon. member had stated that he was almost ready to propose a Bill of his own, it appeared that his plan reduced itself to the simple expedient of establishing three emigrant agents in Europe. He thought the tax on infants produced something more than the sum spoken of by Mr. McGee, but he thought there was an improvement to be found in this measure in this particular, for though it was very difficult to ascertain the difference of age between children of one or two years, it was easy to tell whether a lad was above or under fourteen years of age. He believed though there was a great deal of power and oppression practiced on emigrants a few years ago, there was no such oppression practiced now.

Mr. McGEE believed that one of the worst cases on record was that of the Eliza A. Wright at Quebec last year, which was turned into a brothel on the passage. In the State of New York, in spite of their stringent laws, there never had been worse irregularities than last year.

Mr. FERRES contended still that the evil practices customary in former years upon emigrants to the St. Lawrence, had been put down to a great extent by the present laws. Last year there were five cases of complaint, and in three there were convictions, while in two cases compensation had been made by arrangement. As to what had been said about the proof of the contract, he did know how it was to be got when the contract was not written, nor did he see very well how it could be procured from the Consul. The hon. member for Montreal objected to the Bill, that it did not provide means for procuring that emigrants should remain in Canada instead of passing on to the States. He did not see how this could be accomplished, inasmuch as emigrants, before they left home, generally had their minds made up as to the part of America to which they were to proceed. But it was their object and it was one of the principles of this Bill, to assure the emigrants who made use of the route through Canada, that they would be protected in their passage. If they did not choose to remain in Canada, the next best thing we could do was to get them to pass through Canada, as the best route between Europe and the Western States—in which case our forwarders and steamboats and railways would derive a share of the benefit arising from the stream of emigration. He believed that the Canada route was daily rising in the estimation of the emigrating people of Europe, and that already a considerable portion, which was ever enlarging, of the stream of emigration, was passing through Canada at the expense of the port of Montreal. In 1855, the number of emigrants who arrived at Quebec from Norway and Sweden was 1267; 2,806 in 1856; and 6,400 in 1857. This showed the effect of a good route being opened through Canada, and this Bill, if it did not make the route better known, would by protecting it, render it more eligible. The hon. member for Montreal suggested the appointment of Emigration Agents by the Government of Canada in the ports of Europe. He (Mr. F.) objected entirely to any such thing being done. All that the Government of this country could do, was to place the advantages which Canada offered for emigration, fully, fairly, and properly before the emigrating classes. If they were to establish agencies in Hamburg, Havre, Liverpool, and other ports, parties intending to emigrate would naturally have recourse for advice to the official representatives of the Government of Canada, and the result would be, that, if a cargo of emigrants were landed at Quebec in a destitute condition, our Government would be held responsible for maintaining and settling them—otherwise they would be accused of having induced these people to leave their native homes where they were comfortable and happy, and of having brought them to meet with misery in a foreign land.

Mr. GALT said that unquestionably it was our duty to afford protection to emigrants who landed on our shores. He was glad, therefore, that the Government had moved in the matter, and he looked upon this Bill as a step in the right direction. He did not think the objection of his hon. friend from Montreal, in reference to the 5s. tax on young people, was of any great importance. Perhaps the Commissioner of Public Works, however, might reconsider that point, but on the member for Montreal's own showing, it was only a matter of £300. It was of much importance that emigration should be attracted to Canada to fill up our vacant lands. Every information should be communicated, and all done that could be done to show the emigrating classes that in Canada they would enjoy civil and religious liberty, and a large measure of material comfort. He would be glad to have an assurance from the Government that that matter would be considered with a view to giving practical effect to it. At the same time, with regard to the appointment of agents in Europe, he very much concurred in the remarks of his hon. friend from Brome. Having been connected with a company which had had agents in Europe for the purpose of giving information, and the result was that trouble had frequently arisen from attempts to saddle the company with responsibility for alleged contracts made with European agents. On another point which had been raised, he agreed that the Government could do nothing to induce emigrants taking the route through Canada to remain here. But information could be given in Europe to parties before they left their homes, to induce them to fix upon Canada as the most desirable place in which they could take up their residence.

Mr. HOGAN said he thought in an economical point of view, if in no other, the proposed capitation tax was very objectionable. If ten thousand horses, or double the number of valuable animals of any other kind were landed on our shores free of expense, was it all likely we should put a tax upon them of five shillings each? Then he asked, if it was a correct principle to tax the emigrant? A man, taking him at the very lowest standard of value—regarding him as simply contributing to the material interests of the country, was surely more valuable than a horse or any other animal we might get for nothing. Under these circumstances he could not see why it was that an emigrant should be taxed. There was another clause to which he objected, that which made such uncertain provisions for the redress of injustices to emigrants.—He (Mr. Hogan) thought an officer ought to be appointed who should have, as the surgeon had, a right to visit ships, to inspect them, and redress the injustices of emigrants on the spot. A poor man having neither money nor friends who had been ill-treated and ill-used, might come here, while in all probability the persons who had injured him on board the ship were people of of influence, and the poor emigrant was utterly outborne by the weight of testimony these people could bring against him. In order to keep emigrants here, Mr. Hogan argued, steps ought to be taken to convince them that the advantages Canada offered were equal or superior to those of the United States. This was the way to keep emigrants. The question of carrying all who came to these shores was quite a different matter.

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN said it was much to be regretted that the constitutional diffidence of the hon. member for Montreal, that diffidence which was so much the characteristic of the natives of their common country, had prevented him from laying before the House a series of resolutions, or the draft of a Bill embodying his own views on emigration, when he had so many faults to find with the Bill now before the House. That was the way in which new members generally attempted to win their spurs. The hon. member objected to the alteration of the tax on infants, and said it was only a trente sous affair, a matter of £350. It was because it was a small amount that he proposed to introduce the change. He much preferred that the emigrants should pay that additional small tax, than that a door should be left open to the continued frauds practised at present from the want of uniformity in the tax. He did not profess to be very tight about morals, and did not introduce Sabbath Bills to make moral wrongs criminal offences. But he thought it an important thing to make a change which would take away the inducements to perjury. And at the same time, he thought there should be a tax. He had cherished no sentimalities on behalf of emigrants, although he had always been ready to help the poor to the extent of his small means. But he believed in leaving men to be the architects of their own fortunes without giving them Government support at every step. The hon. member said that British consuls at foreign ports could not be compelled to grant the certificates specified in the Bill. He would reply that British consuls were an honourable class of men, who would do their duty, even if it were not imposed by law, but only by public polity. But as a matter of right, they were bound by law to take notice of the Acts passed in the Colonies. The hon. member objected also to runners being compelled to pay $100 for a license. But the Act did not require $100 to be paid. It merely limited it to $100. It might be five shillings or five pence.—And the hon. gentleman forgot that, before any man could get a license as a runner, he must obtain a certificate of character from the Chief Superintendant of Emigration.—The hon. member said that the runner would make up the $100 by rapacity. Did he think he would throw away his character for $100?

Mr. McGEE—He that buys will sell—as you know well on your side of the House.

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN—There were some wares offered to this side of the House, but they were such damaged wares that they could not be bought at any price.

Cries of Name! Name!

Mr. BROWN—The hon. gentleman has made a series imputation against this side of the House. He should tell us to whom he alludes.

Mr. MACKENZIE—Do tell us about the damaged wares!

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN—I did not refer to the gentleman from Haldimand. The value of his wares was established twenty years ago. But the member for Toronto, as the leader of the member for Montreal, has got up quite indignant that I should say there were damaged wares on that side.—Elated with his recent successes, the hon. gentleman seemed to think it necessary to take all on that side under his protection. The member for Montreal must be much obliged to the hon. gentleman for standing up in his behalf, in return for some of those compliments which the member for Montreal paid him on a late occasion.

Mr. McGEE—You voted with him on the Orange Bill.

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN—The member for Montreal has done me unintentionally for the first and perhaps the last time in his life a service, in referring to my conduct on the Orange Bill. I am happy——

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN—Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed to offer one explanation with regard to that matter. I voted for the first reading of the Bill and then left the House, never conceiving that such a monstrous proposition as that of the member for Montmorensi could have been made.

Mr. SPEAKER—Order!

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—Oh! let the hon. gentleman explain.

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN—I left the House from accidental circumstances. Had I been in the House I would have voted against the motion of the member for Montmorensi. I would have voted against it because I was most anxious to have a discussion on the Bill. But I have voted dead against the second reading. I am not one of those men who take up a cry in this House to get popularity outside, who go up the ladders in virtue of the gun which subsist them, and who will topple down as soon as the gas bursts. I would have voted against the second reading, even had there been a thousand of the most violent men in Canada in the gallery.

Mr. BROWN—As violent as your 15,000 in Quebec?

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN—There have been too many observations made about these 15,000. Observations have been made to me here, which would not have been made to me in an office or a private room.

The SPEAKER—Order! Let the hon. gentleman confine himself to the subject of debate. The order of the day is for the second reading of the Bill on the subject of emigration.

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN then returned to his Bill and went on to say that it was, in his opinion, a great advantage to obtain a speedy trial, with punishment for the wrong doer, and damages for himself.

Mr. HOGAN—Does the hon. member mean to say that this officer can punish wrongs that have been done?

Hon. Mr. ALLEYN said he could refuse a clearance, and could investigate all the cases which came up, and take out a summons against the Captain if necessary.—The hon. member for Grey, however, of whom it may be said

"That still the wonder grew,
"That one small head should carry all he knew."

said that there should be affidavits taken and then that the emigrant should be allowed to go away. Would he take affidavits behind a man's back? But it was said the Captain should have notice. Why it would cost as much time to give the Captain notice as to take evidence in the regular way. He concluded by saying that he thought the man who was sent to Liverpool ought to be an Irishman, a man who was used to this country, who had leisure and was accustomed to speaking, so that the hon. member for Montreal might live in hope. He was not the father of the Bill. It came from the hon. member the Chief of the Board of Agriculture.

Mr. MACKENZIE challanged the hon. member to point out who the damaged ware were on that side of the House. Considering how many wares had been furnished, the House ought certainly to be informed who it was that offered his wares and was refused as cracked. The hon. member has said he did not talk much about morals. Well, perhaps he (Mr. Mackenzie) did not either; but he did not understand being lectured about a Sunday Bill here on Friday, when on Thursday the people were told it was some Saints day, or the day a Pope died, and that our French brethren from down below were too holy to come within a mile of the Parliament House, though they were paid $6 a day for doing nothing. Now as to the Emigrant tax he did not object to 5s on adults. But he did not like the tax on children. Dr. Johnson said, "Catch a Scotchman young," and you can make something of him. Well he thought if we got the children they might make good Canadians. The member for Grey had a fine large county to fill up, and he was right in taking off the tax. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was also against the impost on the babes (laughter.) The Commissioner of the Board of Works to speak of being a man of small means! A man of small means who had $6,000 a year with a private fortune at Quebec. Why he supposed with all these taxes a man would be considered of small means with $15,000 a year. What stopped emigration was bad government—taxes on tea, sugar, &c. There was some years ago a Receiver General here—a born gentleman of course—and he in the most gentlemanly way put $10,000 in his pocket which could never be got out again. Then there was another born gentleman who was appointed to go up among the Indians and encourage emigration there. That hongentleman too put $6,000 in his pocket which never could be got out again. Then there was a Deputy Receiver General, who had sued the other day for his character. Well, in connection with that affair, he would state that he had put his hand on $50,000 of the public money, which had been lost till he had discovered it; and he would now state openly, that if he could get hold of the books again he would find another $50,000. Corruption did not stop with subordinates, it had reached the heads of Departments. Was it to be wondered at then that emigrants did not come to this country, when corruption was so gross that gentlemen opposite said that they could get as much as they wanted and reject the rest as rotten ware. Another thing was, that when one of the finest captains that ever sailed had brought out as noble a cargo of emigrants as ever came to this country, these people were burned and drowned, and yet no punishment was inflicted on the party by whose criminal neglect the accident occurred. The accident on the Desjardin's Canal Bridge was another similar reason why emigrants would not come, for they saw that a law to make trains go slowly, and thus to protect human life, had been repealed by that House with the assistance of this Morrison, who at last had got his deserts. Then look at the Crown Lands agents, who were constantly robbing the public, while a parcel of lazy clerks in the Crown Lands looked on and did nothing. What did the Government do in that case? Why they sent up this Hamilton and this Gowan—the two Grand Masters—one of them a thorough Orange Grand Master, and the other who was in turn a Papist Grand Master and an Orange Grand Master. These men spent a large sum of money; but did the settlers get their lands? They did not, and it was the letters of these people to their friends which prevented emigration. The hon. gentleman too, had talked of recent successes. These successes seemed to disturb the minds of the occupants of the Treasury Benches. They might—at least people said that some persons might pack committees; but they could not pack Oxford, in spite of all the Talbots and Morrisons who went up there electioneering; and he thought the best bill the gentlemen could give the House was, when his friend Wm. McDougall walked in for them to walk out.

Mr. ROSS approved of the general character of the Bill. A great number of the abuses which occurred were caused by the want of proof. Emigrants generally received a contract ticket when starting for this country. They were treated badly on shipboard, meeting with gross injustice, and when they arrived here they found there was no remedy, on account of the nature of the evidence which the law required. He would suggest to the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill that it would be well to make the contract ticket prima facie evidence. He would also introduce a provision giving a right of the vessel. Make the captain responsible, and the agent or owner of the vessel would take good care that the contract was not violated. He suggested this as an amendment which he hoped would be considered in committee.

The Bill was then read a second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

☞The imports at the port of New York for the first four months of the present year, only amounts to $40,213,469; but for the same period in 1857 to $86,885,040; showing a decrease in round numbers of $46,000,000.

A BY-LAW

To establish and regulate a Public Market in the Town of Peterborough. Passed 3rd day of May, A. D., 1858.

WHEREAS it is necessary further to establish and regulate a Public Market in the Town of Peterborough and to fix the tolls thereof,

BE it therefore enacted by the Town Council of the Town of Peterborough, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same,

1. That all By-Laws and parts of By-Laws of this Council, passed previous to the passing of this By-Law and contrary to and inconsistent with this By-Law, in so far as the same are so contrary to and inconsistent with this By-Law, be and the same are hereby repealed.

2. That the present Market House of the said Town, and so much of the Market block of land as is not disposed of for other purposes, shall be the Market House and Market place for the said Town, and all produce, commodities, articles and things brought for public sale within the said town, including meat sold by the Butchers, shall not be exposed or offered for sale elsewhere, except in the cases hereinafter specially excepted.

3. That every day in the year shall be a Market day, except the Sabbath day, Good Friday, Christmas day, and such days as may be set apart by Royal proclamation, or by the Mayor of the said town, for fasting and prayer or for public rejoicing, and no person shall expose for sale any article, commodity or thing on any of those days so excepted.

4. That on all such Market days as aforesaid, that part of the Market house used as a Butcher's market, shall be kept open from five o'clock A. M. until two o'clock P. M., from the first day of April until the first day of October inclusive, and during the remainder of the year from seven o'clock A. M., until three o'clock P. M., except on Saturdays of each week throughout the whole year, when the Butchers market shall not close before nine o'clock P. M. But the said Market place shall be open for the sale of the commodities herein-before mentioned at all times during the day.

5. That all persons resorting to the said Market house and Market place with produce, commodities, articles or things for sale shall be guided, corrected, and controlled by the Clerk of the Market or other person appointed, in the arrangement of stands and vehicles and the order in which each shall be placed, so as to produce order and regularity, and no person shall thwart, hinder or molest him in the discharge of his duty.

6. That all the space marked out in the said market place by the Mayor, under resolution of this Council and marked A, shall be a market for such farmers, market gardners, and others as shall bring to market and exhibit for sale produce, commodities, articles or things.

7. That all the space marked out in the said market place by the Mayor, under resolution of this Council and marked B, shall be a market for all Hucksters and dealers in produce, commodities, articles or things of any nature whatever within the limits of the said market place.

8. That all the space marked out in the said market place by the Mayor, under resolution of this Council and marked C, shall be and the same is hereby established as a market for firewood, lumber and shingles, in so far as relates to stands for sleighs, waggons and other vehicles carrying firewood, lumber and shingles, and that the said sleighs, waggons and vehicles containing or carrying such shall be placed in the order and according to the directions of the Market Clerk or other person appointed in the premises by this Council.

9. That all the space marked out on the said market place by the Mayor, under resolution of this Council and marked D, be and the same is hereby established as a market for cattle, horses, sheep and pigs, where such shall and may be exposed or exhibited for sale.

10. That all the space marked out on the said market place by the Mayor, under resolution of this Council and marked E, be and the same is hereby established as a market for the sale of hay and straw, and that all vehicles containing the same shall be placed therein in the order prescribed by the Market Clerk, or other person appointed in the premises by this Council.

11. That all the space marked out on the market place by the Mayor, under resolution of this Council and marked F, be and the same is hereby established as the place for all sales by public Auction, and that hereafter all public sales of property or Auctions held out of doors within the limits of the said town, shall be held and shall take place within and upon the place herein-before in this section mentioned, and not otherwise or elsewhere.

12. That no empty cart, truck, waggon, or sleigh, shall be permitted to stand in the market place, provided always that Butchers renting stalls in the Market House shall be permitted to place their carts, waggons, or sleighs, at some place pointed out by the Clerk of the Market, or other person appointed thereto and not elsewhere, but such horses as may be harnessed thereto shall be securely fastened to prevent escape or running away.

13. That all tainted, blown, or measly meat, tainted fish, poultry, eggs, provisions or vegetables offered or exposed for sale within the limits of the said town, shall be seized and destroyed, and the person or persons offering or exposing such for sale, shall be dealt with as hereinafter provided.

14. That all hay and straw sold within the limits of the said town, shall be weighed upon the public Scales, and not elsewhere, and that a ticket showing the gross weight and tare and net weight of each load of such hay and straw, shall be given by the Clerk of the Market or Weigh Master, or other person appointed, to the seller or owner of such hay and straw, which ticket shall also state the year, day of the month and hour of the day on and at which such hay and straw were weighed.

15. That all firewood hereafter brought into and exposed or offered for sale within the limits of the said town, shall be sold by the cord, or waggon or sleigh load, and that such cord shall contain one hundred and twentyeight cubic feet.

16. That there shall be a Market Clerk appointed by resolution of this Council, to hold office during the pleasure of this Council, and that the salary of such Market Clerk shall be fixed and regulated by resolution of this Council in that behalf.

17. That there shall be an Inspector of firewood appointed by resolution of this Council, whose duty it shall be, should either buyer or seller so require, to inspect, measure, examine and approve of or condemn all firewood exhibited, exposed or offered for sale within the limits of the said town, for which duty he shall be entitled to receive from the seller of such wood the sum of two pence per cord and no more—provided always, that either seller or buyer may appeal against the decision of the Inspector of firewood to the Mayor of the said town, whose decision in the matter of appeal shall be final, and the loser shall pay the costs, provided also that it shall be the duty of the said Inspector of firewood, upon information given him, to inspect and examine any firewood publicly exhibited and offered for sale within the limits of the said town, and in case the said firewood shall be found short of the measure stated, or represented by the owner or seller, (when such statement shall appear to have been made fraudulently or deceitfully,) or shall be found not closely or properly piled, the person or persons offering or exposing the same for sale, shall be dealt with as hereinafter provided, as for an infraction of this By-Law.

18. That all Butchers occupying Stalls in the Butchers' Market, shall be obliged to keep their Stalls open during Market hours of each and every Market day.

19. That all wheat, flour, bread baked at any public bakery and offered or exposed for sale within the limits of the town, shall not be compounded or mixed with any deleterious substance or substances, and that the loaf shall be of the full weight of four pounds, and the half loaf shall be of the full weight of two pounds, when weighed, but not sooner than four hours after being removed from the oven in which such loaves had been baked, provided always, that it shall be lawful at any time between the hours of six o'clock A. M., and six o'clock P. M., of each working day in every year, for the Mayor or Police Magistrate, accompanied by the High Bailiff, to enter into any public bakery or place where wheat flour bread shall be exposed or offered for sale, or to examine the contents of any bread cart or sleigh, and to weigh one or more loaves in such bakery place, bread cart or sleigh, and if found deficient of the full weight as aforesaid, or if found mixed with any deleterious substance or substances, or to be mouldy, or in any way contrary to the full intent and meaning of this By-Law, then all such loaves, as may be deficient in weight or mixed with any deleterious substance or substances, or mouldy, or otherwise unwholesome, shall be seized and taken from the said bakery, place, bread cart, sleigh or waggon, and the owner of such bread shall be deemed to have been guilty of an infraction of this By-Law, and the bread shall be destroyed or given for the use of the poor. Provided always, that the like regulations and penalties as aforesaid, shall in all respects be applicable to and regarding brown bread.

20. That Farmers and others shall be permitted to sell or dispose of fresh meat, off or from their waggons, carts or sleighs, while standing in the Market place, by the carcass, side or quarter only, the weight of which shall at the option of the buyer be determined by being weighed in the public Scales by the Clerk of the Market, or other person duly appointed, and for the weighing of which the owner or seller shall pay the charges hereinafter provided.

21. That any person who shall be guilty of forestalling, regrating or monopolising, either in person or by an agent, or person, by him or her directed or requested so to do, either on the Market place, the streets, or the limits of the said town, shall be guilty of an infraction of this By-Law; provided always, that the buying or offering to buy by any Butcher, dealer or huckster, or the selling or offering for sale, or the bargaining for by any Farmer or other person to any Butcher, dealer or huckster, either as to quantity or price of any commodity, article, produce or thing brought for sale to the Town, shall be deemed forestalling, and is hereby prohibited, if done before the hour of nine o'clock, A. M. of each Market day, from the first day, of April to the first day of November inclusive in each year, of if done before the hour of ten o'clock A. M. of each Market day during the remainder of the year; provided always that if any Butcher, dealer or huckster, shall have in his or her possession any produce, article, commodity or thing so brought for sale by a Farmer or seller, although not delivered until after the hours respectively mentioned as aforesaid—this shall be taken as prima facie evidence of his or her having violated this clause by forestalling.

22. That there shall not be any trick or device used whereby any meat, fish, flesh, fowl, produce or commodity, articles or things exposed or offered for sale, would be deceitfully enhanced in weight, bulk, appearance or value within the town, and that in every such case it shall be lawful for the Clerk of the Market, or the Mayor, to seize and destroy the same, or to forfeit it, and to bring summarily the person having it in his or her possession before the Mayor of the town to be dealt with for his, her, or their offence.

23. That the Butchers' Market shall be thoroughly whitewashed once in each year, namely, on the first Tuesday in May, and that the floors of the stalls and all passages leading thereto inside of the Market House, shall be thoroughly swept out on the afternoons of each and every Market day between the hours of two and six o'clock, Saturdays in each week excepted. And also, that the benches or stands on which meat be laid out or exposed for sale, shall be well scratched or cleaned at least once in each week, and that such stands or benches shall be so placed as not to interrupt the public passage, all of which cleaning and arrangements shall be done to the satisfaction of the Clerk of the Market; provided always, that the sweeping out of the stalls shall be done immediately after the market hours, and the sweeping of all passages shall be done by the person employed in cleansing the Market place; provided also that no dogs shall be permitted at any time in the Butchers' market on any pretence whatever, and that should dogs be harboured, or permitted in or about any stall, the owner or occupant of such stall shall be deemed to be guilty of harbouring dogs therein or thereabouts.

24. That no gambling of any nature whatsoever, nor any games for pleasure or amusement, shall be allowed in the public market places or Market House, nor in any of the streets of the town, nor shall any dog-fighting in or at any of the said places; and the standing by and looking on at any such gambling, gaming or dog-fighting, shall be deemed prima facie evidence of participation in such gambling, gaming or dog-fighting; provided always, that should any dog-fight take place within the aforesaid places or limits, the dogs fighting shall be instantly destroyed by the High Constable.

25. That it shall be the duty of the occupier of any house or premises in or about which any dog or bitch is kept, to keep in and confine or muzzle the same after any order shall be issued by the Mayor and Council for that purpose, under a penalty of twenty shillings and costs, and that it shall be lawful for the High Bailiff or any Constable, or any inhabitant of the town, to kill and destroy any dog or bitch running at large unmuzzled during the time ordered by the Mayor and Council for them to be kept in, chained, confined or muzzled.

26. That any person who shall make use of any profane swearing, indecent, abusive, or blasphemous language in the Market House, market places, streets, lanes or yards, or in any house of public entertainment within the town, shall be deemed guilty of an infraction of this By-Law.

27. That the Tolls of the Town, other than rents arising from Butchers' stalls, and rents arising from tables or stands described in this By-Law, and rents of tenements in the Town Market Buildings, shall be farmed, leased or rented to the highest and best tender, or by Auction, on the first Monday in May in each year, except for the present year, which shall be on the 1st Monday in June; provided always, that at least one week's notice shall be given for tenders or Auction, in each and every newspaper published in the town, and also that at least twenty large sized legibly printed bills shall be posted up in conspicuous places throughout the town, giving notice for such tenders, or Auction, as aforesaid, and provided always, no tender or bid at such Auction, shall be received or accepted which shall not be accompanied by the names of two good and sufficient persons binding themselves individually and collectively for the due fulfilment of the contract, and the faithful payment of such amount as may be offered for such contract, whether such contract shall prove profitable or not.

28. That the following Market Tolls and charges, and none others, shall be made and collected under this By-Law, viz:—

The Route to the New Gold Field.

The Toronto Globe says: We have received several letters from residents in various parts of Canada, asking information as to the best method of reaching Vancouver Island. These persons are, no doubt, attracted by the accounts of the gold discoveries, and desire to cast in their lot with the early settlers in that country. While we would not encourage any man to abandon a good position in Canada, to follow the uncertain, and oft-times unprofitable, avocation of gold-hunting, we cannot doubt that there are many whose nature leads them to adventurous enterprise, who might find a home as much to their liking on the shores of the Pacific as on the banks of Lake Ontario; and we should be glad that Canada had representatives in a country which must sooner or later be connected with her by very close and binding ties. When communication is once opened with the Red River and the Saskatchewan districts, we have no doubt practicable routes will be found across the Rocky Mountains, through British territory; but, in the meantime, we believe that the best course for persons desirous of reaching Vancouver Island is to take the Isthmus route to Panama, and from thence to San Francisco, where there are steamers which ply regularly to the mouth of the Columbia, in the American territory of Oregon, from whence, we have no doubt, communication can easily be had with Vancouver Island. The fame of the gold discoveries will be sure to attract adventurers from San Francisco and other Pacific ports; there must be many natives of Britain in those places who will desire to pursue their adventures on British rather than on American soil, and there is every prospect of a considerable colony springing up at Vancouver Island without delay. No doubt, vessels will ere long leave England direct for the new colony; but the route by the Isthmus will be, in any case, the most direct.

We have, likewise, received applications from a large party in Toronto, who desire to settle in the Saskatchewan country, enquiring what rights the Hudson's Bay Company hold over the lands in that district. The Company claim to possess the whole territory, and have actually sold land to settlers. The claims of settlers who bring into cultivation unsurveyed lands, have always been recognized in America, and we have no doubt that they will be so in this case, perhaps more readily than in any other. There are also many other avenues to wealth in the new country besides farming.

Navigation Improvements.

From the Report of the Commissioners of Public Works.

PORT HOPE, February 18th, 1858.

SIR,—I have the honour to submit the following Report for the information of the Commissioners, on the state of the works now in progress of construction at Bobcaygeon and Buckhorn rapids, and the improvements made in the navigation of the River Scugog, below Lindsay, by the deepening and straightening of the channel, and other matters connected with the navigation of those waters.

All the works are in a very satisfactory state, and I shall enumerate in as concise a manner as possible the different new improvements which have been made in the navigation, and the vast advantages which the back country must derive from them.

BOBCAYGEON WORKS.

The masonry both of the lock and the grist and saw mill flumes is completed, and owing to the high state of the water a good deal of difficulty had to be contended with, the masons being obliged to suspended operations on the 25th November, 1856, and could not resume work again until the 10th of September, 1857. The lock gates are in their places and are perfectly watertight, both at the hollow quoins and at the point of mitre. The conduit of canal is also finished, a portion of which, about 500 feet long, is timbered and planked on both sides, and the bottom in many places being full of fissures has been filled in with concrete and afterwards double planked and well spiked down, which makes it perfectly staunch. The remaining portion, about 400 feet in length, is formed of natural banks, the bottom and sides of which are well puddled, which makes it perfectly secure. The dams have undergone thorough repairs, having been all planked with 3 in. plank, well spiked down and backed up with puddle and afterwards loaded down with gravel, which makes them perfectly staunch. They were commenced on the 24th of August, 1857, and in doing so much additional expense has been unavoidably incurred, as before the work could be commenced, cofferdams had to be built at much expense and inconvenience to the contractor, owing to the high state of the water and not wishing to lower it too suddenly during the summer months, as a great deal of uneasiness seemed to prevail amongst the inhabitants in the vicinity of those waters when they heard the waters were to be lowered, much sickness being apprehended to arise from the decayed vegetable matter that would be exposed to the sun. Another objection raised to lowering the water too early in the season was on account of its affecting the navigation. The consequence was, that this portion of the work was put off to the last moment in expectation of the water falling, but as it continued high all the season, cofferdamming had to be resorted to as a last resource, and without doing so they could not be repaired this season. Timbers for new piers at the slide are delivered. The old stone pier being almost useless owing to the water finding its way under it through fissures in the rock some distance above the dam. To meet this difficulty it will be necessary to construct a short dam 120 feet in length (below the old pier) to connect with the new wooden one, and the main land. The rock here being much more solid than it is above, the slide can be made quite staunch. This dam will throw back the water, and will not be attended with much additional expense to what was already contemplated.

The new swing bridge built the year before last has been painted this last season, and all obstructions in the navigation of the river below the lock have been removed, and a few days work in the spring, trimming up the tow path and building the new piers at the side of the dam will complete the navigation at Bobcaygeon.

BUCKHORN RAPIDS.

The repairs of the dam were fully completed the year before last, and part of the bridge built anew. The remaining portion of the old bridge, about 500 feet long, has been removed this winter, and the materials for the new one are nearly all delivered, and carpenters are busily engaged framing. I expect by bet this whole finished by the 1st of March. The length of the bridge when completed will be 642 feet.

SCUGOG RIVER.

A great deal of dredging was effected last summer in the Scugog river below Lindsay, in addition to that done last year, which has improved the navigation of that river very materially, having done away with a great many crooked bends, which were very awkward for vessels passing up and down. There remains but one point of land to be taken off, about 100 feet in length, to complete the water communication between Sturgeon Lake and Lindsay, and this will be dredged next season.

To complete the navigation I should suggest the removal of some boulders which impede the navigation at Bobcaygeon, about half a mile above the dam, and at Buckhorn to the narrows about three miles above the bridge. Besides the removal of boulders at the latter place, I should recommend the buoying of the channel at two points where large and dangerous rocks obstruct the passage of steamers, (and I might add of small boats) as during the summer season they are almost exposed to view. The cost of which, and the removal of boulders in both places, I estimate at $950.

The booms at Buckhorn which were built where the dam was repaired the year before last, have been carried away and broken up, owing, I understand, to the negligence of raftsmen allowing seven thousand saw logs to run against them, without taking the necessary precaution of first removing the stop logs in the slide. The current here being very rapid, and to guard against a similar accident occurring again, I should recommend the building of two small wooden piers triangular shaped and filled in with stone, to which I propose to fasten the booms by iron bolts. Those piers being placed equi-distant between the slide and shore, would tend towards strengthening the booms very materially. The former booms were 740 feet in length, of which only 140 feet can be made available, as it would cost more to collect them than would build a new one. I estimate the cost of repairing boom and building new piers at $1425.75.

The new lock at Lindsay is loudly called for, especially since the completion of the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway as far as that town, and the old wooden lock being quite impassable since last spring, owing to which and the shoal of rock extending from the lock some two-thirds of a mile down the river, steamers from Fenelon Falls to Port Perry could not pass Lindsay and were obliged to transfer both their lumber and freight from one vessel to another, which was a great source of annoyance and inconvenience to the public, as well as being attended with much expense. Men are busily engaged getting out timber both for the foundation and gates of the new locks, and stonecutters are also employed in the quarry at Bobcaygeon getting out and preparing the stone.

I would respectfully call the attention of the Commissioners to the necessity of building a few landing piers for the accommodation of vessels navigating those back lakes, they are very much wanting, and now more particularly since the new improvements in the Scugog river have been made and the new lock at Bobcaygeon completed.

The privilege which proprietors of saw mills seem to have of throwing slabs and other rubbish into rivers and streams is a very great source of annoyance and very much complained of, (and I think very justly,) as in many instances those slabs have been known to scatter over a very large surface before sinking, and in many places they form snags, and in others they accumulate so fast in a short time as to cause very serious impediments in the navigation. I mention this with the hope that some measures may be adopted towards remedying this evil.

It is really surprising to see with what rapidity the country north of Bobcaygeon is being settled since the commencement of the new lock at that place and the other improvements in connection with it, and although for some distance into the interior the land is not of the best description, yet almost all the lots in the new surveyed townships of Galway and Seymour are taken up, and new settlers are arriving every day. The land continues to improve the further back you go, and after getting back ten or twelve miles it will compare favourably with any land in the Province. The Government are now constructing a new line of road immediately north of Bobcaygeon, which is to extend about forty miles into the interior; fifteen miles are already completed, along which the country on each side begins to assume quite a settled appearance. Log houses are put up and clearings made here and there, where a short time since nothing was to be seen but a dense forest of trees.

I understand that the lumbermen complain of the slide at Buckhorn Rapids being too short, and are about petitioning the Commissioners to have it lengthened between two and three hundred feet so as to bring it into slack water.

In alluding to the proposed improvements in the navigation at Healey's Falls and Crook's Rapids, on the River Trent, I have only to add that, in accordance with instructions received from the Honourable the Commissioners (last summer) to examine and report on the proposed works, and having done so, found that the appropriation of £1,000 was by no means adequate to meet those improvements, as besides the removal of boulders and other obstructions in the river, and staunching the dams at both those places, a new swing bridge is required. I should recommend the postponement of operations until more money is granted sufficient to meet those improvements.

The whole being respectfully submitted.

I have the honour to be,
Sir, your obedient servant,
EDWARD BROWNE, C. E.

A Love-Sick Swain.

On Friday last the following scene occurred at the Toronto Police Court, which we clip from the Globe:—

A youth of some twenty summers, rejoicing in the euphonious name of Ferdinand Fitzgerald, was placed at the bar. The offender had a theatrical air, and looked as if he had had a share of the ills of life. There seemed little doubt but that he had more than once figured on the "boards."

The Constable stated that the defendant was this morning standing on King Street East, playing a guitar and singing.

Prisoner—Your Worship, do you hear what the man says? The fact is, I was playing my light guitar with great sweetness and pathos, and accompanying its strains with that most beautiful of Irish melodies—"Believe me, if all these endearing young charms,"—when the rude "guardian of the peace" interrupted me, and would not allow me to finish.

The Constable—I told him to desist, your Worship, and move on, as the noise he made caused more than one night-capped head to protrude from the windows. In these "times of danger," I thought the "noise" might be mistaken for the dismal peal of the alarm bell.

Prisoner (interrupting)—Oh, my! your Lordship sees that the fellow knows nothing of music, "that food of love!"

The Court, to constable—Did you order the prisoner to leave, and did he refuse?

The Constable—He did, your Honour; and, besides, by the way,

Court to prisoner—What do you say to that?

Prisoner—I allow, your Lordship—(Court correcting him, say worship)—well, your Worship, to tell you a "secret." (laughter.) I was taking tea with the lady of my heart, and upon leaving, the sweet creature made me take "a drop of something," and then the natural consequences followed, for "whom have not the flowing bowls made eloquent." In return for the compliment, and in duty bound for her kindness, and also, though last not least, for the love I bore her, I was giving her a "serenade."

Constable—After taking him to the cell, your Worship, he sang the whole night, his principal song being "My lodgings are on the cold ground." (Loud laughter.)

The Court to prisoner—You must pay a fine of $2 and $1 50 costs, or go to gaol.

Prisoner—Folding his arms, exclaimed in a dignified manner, "My Lord, I have none of the 'filthy dross'."

The defendant was then removed from the bar, amid the sympathy of the audience, and after first remarking that the "world is but a stage," sang sotto voce as he was being taken to the lock up—

"I'd mourn the hopes that leave me."

Palmer Outdone.

Mrs. Phœbe Westlake, of the village of Chester, Orange County, New York, has committed suicide by swallowing a too large dose of arsenic. Before dying she confessed to have poisoned eight individuals, her husband among the number, six of whom have died.

"A few days previous to taking poison herself, she presented a jar of preserves to Mrs. Chas. S. Tuthil and some sugar to Mrs. Derrick, upon using which they were taken sick with symptoms of poison, which aroused suspicion, and the articles were immediately analysed by Dr. Smith, and found to contain arsenic. The cause she assigned for taking poison was not to kill herself, but to make herself sick, in order to divert suspicion from resting on her."

The Property Qualification in Parliament.

Mr. PRINCE, in the Legislative Council, has introduced a Bill to remove entirely from members of the Legislature, the necessity at present enforced of their declaring themselves possessed of the standards of property severally established for its deliberative branches. The imposition of the property qualification owes its origin to the same feeling which confines the electoral body to such male adults as, being otherwise qualified, are possessed of the advantages the law declares to be the essence of the franchise. It is the jealousy belonging to, and inseparable from the acquisition of wealth, fencing itself in from what it feels to be the dangerous company of the masses, which makes men seek such means of preserving the guardianship of their accumulations within their own class; and upon the principle that those who have only their persons to protect, and who, by having nothing to be taxed, would gain by the imposition of taxes, are not fit persons to be intrusted with a voice in the ruling power of the country. This principle, however, is fundamentally wrong, for a man's personal liberty and political prejudices are as much better grounds whereon to found his right of political existence, as the possession of that liberty is superior to the possession of accumulated wealth. To despise wealth is to discourage industry, seeing that, if there were no advantage to be derived from its possession, beyond the actual use to be taken out of it, no one would care to supply himself with anything beyond his immediate necessities, and consequently, as in the savage life, there would be no opportunities of making progress towards a cultivated state; but this sentiment may be carried too far, and in the anxiety to honor the fruits of industry and providence, the natural rights of mankind, independent of their acquired rights, are apt to be overlooked. Then again, the principle that those who have property are the best capable of taking care of it, is often only true in those who give proof of their trustworthiness, while they were pursuing the guarded and industrious course which made them fortunate. The inheritors of good fortune are as apt to distribute as increase their stock, and it is a providential arrangement that makes it so, for if, from father to son, a continual uninterrupted process of increase were to go on, there would be no chance to rise, among those who were once down, and the world would be divided between the perpetual ups and perpetual downs; until at last the downs would rise up, and redistribute its wealth. Then as to intelligence, which after all we must suppose to be the real standard of qualification, it is by no means certain that it is more general among the wealthy class than among the comfortable mechanic, farming or labouring classes. For although the control of riches brings the means of acquiring knowledge more within reach, yet the absence of the great stimulant, necessity, is too often the cause of those opportunities being neglected, and the fortunate fool contents himself with having his praises sung by his sycophant companions, while the ambitious struggler, exerting his natural parts, rises to the surface and forces an acknowledgment of his superiority over pampered indolence and pride. In England, attempts are made, periodically, to shake off the badge of inferiority which a property qualification is a member of parliament, beyond what is felt necessary in an elector, implies towards the great body of the people; but there the established power of an aristocracy is strong enough to smother reform. Here, in Canada, the power of the country is with the many, and it is wonderful that any, who are not of the aristocrat stamp, should submit to see excluded from their Councils all the worth of the land that is not also stamped with what an aristocratic exclusiveness has thought proper to mark it with. The inconvenience of a £500 property qualification, in the House of Assembly, has not been so much experienced, perhaps because those who had not got it, contented themselves with staying behind, or perhaps because, having run the gauntlet, they escaped through the ordeal, by a trick. But notwithstanding there has been little practical inconvenience observed, it is wrong to require this test from a legislator, otherwise properly elected. To do so is, in fact, to put his material before his moral worth, and to give the chief virtue to his acres. In the Legislative Council, however, there is a palpable injury; there the members must possess land of the value of £2,000, and the object is to throw it into the hands of a landed aristocracy. We hope Mr. Prince will succeed in removing the anomaly which, seeking for moral and intellectual development, leaves the true ground, and searches only among the rich for qualities to which their claim is no more respected by nature, than that of the general run of mankind.

Opening of the Road.

The Peterboro and Millbrook Branch of the Port Hope and Lindsay Railroad will be formally opened on Monday next, and an Excursion Train will leave Port Hope at 9 o'clock in the morning, with a large party, when that part of the trouble which arose out of the question of the opening or closing will be set at rest.

The Fishery Act.

Mr. SICOTTE has introduced a Bill in the House of Assembly whereby it is intended to make better provision for the preservation and regulation of the Fisheries of this Province. Without wishing to find fault with the provisions of the Bill generally, there are nevertheless some points which ought to be removed, and which could only have been added to it through want of reflection in its author. Section XXV. for instance, says "it shall not be lawful at any time to fish for, catch, or kill salmon, salmon trout, or any kind of trout, white fish, bass, or maskinonge, by the aid of spears, nor by the aid of torch light, or other artificial light." Now this is the common mode used upon the small inland waters by the fisherman, or settler, to provide himself with fish, and it would be needlessly interfering with their habits of fishing, to debar them from the use of it. This country is not yet so populous, nor is its population so much distinguished by artificial growth, as to make it any great object to punish the struggling settler for the benefit of the fish, or to create a fish preserve for the amusement of a few pleasure seekers, who would restrain every one else from using the privilege of fishing, unless only in the manner they adopt themselves. Section XXXVI declares that "it shall not be lawful to catch maskinonge, pickerel, nor black bass, between the 1st of February and the 15th day of May. And the contravention of any of these provisions subjects the transgressor to a fine of from two to five pounds, to be recovered before any magistrate, one half of the fine to go to the Queen, and the other half to the person lodging the complaint; or failing the payment of the fine, then the offender to be committed to gaol, for a term of not less than one month, or more than six months. We hope the Bill will not become law with such out of the way restraints as these we have remarked upon. The only effect it would have is to encourage spiteful or sordid persons in giving annoyance by the law, when the cause of complaint cannot be said to have any necessary foundation, and where the legal transgressor is carrying out an innocent and ready method of bringing to his table the provision which Providence has thrown in his way.

SPRINGVILLE, May 18, 1858.

The Springville Total Abstinence Society held its second regular meeting in the Springville Church on Monday the 10th inst. The Chair was occupied by the Rev. W. Blain, President of the Society. The meeting having been opened by prayer and praise, the Rev. W. Scott of Peterboro' delivered a most suitable and earnest address on the evils of intemperance, and the advantages of total abstinence principles.

On the Wednesday previous Mr. Scott also lectured at the Town Hall, North Monaghan, under the auspices of the "North Monaghan Intellectual Improvement Society" on the same subject.

The delivery of these lectures seems to have aroused the people very much, and it is to be hoped that the most favourable results will follow.

This neighbourhood was considered by many as the last place that would favor the Temperance movement, but it is most gratifying to find that although it is scarcely two months since the organization of the Society, it now numbers about one hundred members, embracing many of the most influential persons in the neighbourhood, and such as seem well adapted for carrying out the high objects of the Society, so that the friends and supporters of total abstinence have just grounds for being truly thankful that their efforts have thus in the commencement been so signally successful.

In this rapid growth we see reason to thank God and take courage. Our influence as a Society is already beginning to be felt for good; and we trust it will be on a much larger scale.

A great deal, however, yet remains to be done, but I am convinced that if the members of the Society continue steadily and perseveringly to do their duty, a rich harvest will eventually crown their exertions and the demon of Intemperance be forced to abandon his strongholds in this locality.

A return has been printed of the number of proprietors of East India Stock. The total is 5782, of whom 4730 are males and 1052 females. The proportion who hold £1000 and upwards, and who are therefore qualified to vote, are 1356 males and 408 females.

QUEBEC, May 17th, 1858.

The "North American," which left Liverpool at 11 o'clock in the afternoon, on the 6th instant, passed "Brandy Pots", at five this morning.

The "Indian Daily News" says, that the Oude campaign has failed. Sir Colin Campbell's conquest was only an empty city and that the final battle ground will be Rohilcund, and that nothing farther will be attempted yet, owing to the hot weather.

GREAT BRITAIN.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Lord Ellenborough said he considered it inexpedient to lay any documents on the table, giving an account of the Cawnpore massacre, as it would only be calculated to revive animosities. He also advocated perfect neutrality by the Government in religious affairs in India.

In the House of Commons a long debate took place on the financial affairs of the country.

The bill imposing a stamp on cheques was read a second time.

Mr. Disraeli's second resolution on India declaring it expedient that the Government be confined to a Secretary of State, with power to perform all duties heretofore carried out by the India Company, was debated, and finally carried by a vote of 251 to 100.

Mr. Disraeli announced, incidentally, that the Bank of England had accomodated the Government with two millions, at three and a quarter per cent., for redemption of Exchequer Bills, but that the Government had only availed itself, as yet, of one million.

On the 4th nothing important in the House of Lords.

In the House of Commons Mr. Roebuck gave notice that he would soon call attention to the Suez Canal.

Gen. Peel announced that no more militia regiments were to be disbanded.

Mr. Gladstone moved an address to the Queen, praying that in the future organization of the Danubian Principalities just weight be given to the wishes of the people of Wallachia and Moldavia, in other words, that the House of Commons should endorse the Union of the Principalities.—He urged his views at length, when a general debate ensued, involving the whole question of the Principalities.

Lord Palmerston, Mr. Disraeli and others opposed the motion, as a dictation to the Conference, which meets at Paris, on the 10th of May, and fettering the action of the British Plenipotentiary.

Lord John Russell supported the motion, but it was rejected by 178 majority.

Mr. Fitzgerald announced that Sardinia cordially acquiesced in the suggestions of England in the Cagliari affair, and that harmony was consequently established between Sardinia and England.

The Daily News asserts, if Lord Derby meets with a factious opposition, he will dissolve Parliament.

The camp at the Curragh in Kilkare was to be increased. Upwards of 7,000 troops were already in camp.

A collision occurred in St. George's Channel between a coasting steamer, the Buzzard, and the bark Wm. Campbell. Both vessels sunk, and 20 or 30 lives lost. The schooner George, bound from Liverpool for the Niger expedition, also foundered in the channel, and seven of her crew were drowned.

It was rumored that the government will soon proclaim a national day of thanksgiving for the success in India.

FRANCE.

General Epinasse recommended the Emperor to sanction the removal of all Prefects, Sub-Prefects, Secretaries, Generals, and Councillors of Prefecture, who have attained certain ages calculated to impair administrative powers.

The circulation of the Independence Belge has been interdicted in France for one month.

M. DeChasseorn, son-in-law, of Prince Murat, is appointed French Charge d'Affairs in China, vice M. De Bourboulon.

The Budget for 1859 has been adopted in the Legislative body by 256 votes against 3.

Trade in Paris exhibited a slight improvement. Flour rather higher. Wheat firm. Grain crops are looking favourable and vines are promising well. Wine and brandies are dull and slightly lower.

The Chamber Dismises an Accusation at Dijon, have decided on sending before the Correctional Police Court of Chalons thirty-five persons implicated in recennt disturbances in that place.

ITALY.

A note has been presented to the Neapolitan Government demanding indemnity for imprisonment of the two English engineers. The indemnity is said amounts to 100,000 francs, and the king appeared inlined to negotiate.

Armaments continued in the Neapolitan arsenal.

Another despatch says that the indemnity demanded is 400,000 francs.

Danish, French, English, and Russian Envoys at Frankfort, request the Diet to take the Danish proposals into re-consideration, so as bring the difference between Denmark and the Diet to an amicable termination.

The Commission on Duches had made its report to the Diet.

RUSSIA.

Ice was floating down the Neva.

An imperial ukase imposes a duty of 5 copecs per rouble on all articles of European export and import, except sugar.

Letters report serious risings among the serfs in some localities, and the interposition of the military was called to restore order.

INDIA.

In the news taken out by the Persia, it was said Col. Wilman's force was cut up at Azinghur. An explanation shows that this was a telegraph blunder on the words "SHUT UP."

Bombay letters add little of interest to the telegraphic accounts.

Sir Colin Campbell remained at Lucknow but would probably move shortly on to Sundola, and then into Rochilcund.

English grand arms had been redistributed with a view to future operations in the field.

Nena Sahib, reinforced by Barrally Khan proposed to attack the English. The British experienced a reverse in the vicinity of Allahabad.

AUSTRALIA.

The steamer Essex, the arrival of which at Suez from Australia was announced by the Persia, had two hundred and five thousand pounds in gold freight. At Melbourne, on the 17th March, trade was depressed, although it has been slightly better.

The weather having been stormy, several vessels put back into Liverpool badly; amongst them the "Minnesota," for Montreal. The "Minnesota" was totally dismasted.

Canada as an Outlet to the Ocean.

(From the London Morning Chronicle.)

As the discovery of the passage to India round the Cape of Good Hope completely changed the course of trade between Asia and Europe, so in our times on the North American continent we may witness a revolution of a character scarcely less important, which will render the ports of the St. Lawrence the main conduit of the produce of the north western States of the American Union, superseding the Erie Canal and the harbor of New York. The Canadians already speculate on the junction of the Atlantic and Pacific by a railway stretching from the St. Lawrence to Vancouver's Island, through British territory, and they are actually preparing to connect Lake Ontario with Lake Huron by a ship canal. They calculate on transporting to Europe the agricultural products of a million and a half of square miles, lying around the great lakes, with the region west and north-west, where all the grains and grasses are capable of growing luxuriantly, where flocks of sheep will yield rich fleeces, and fat beeves reward the enterprise of the grazier. The line of coast formed by the margins of the lakes is upwards of 4 000 statute miles, and the region above the lakes organised into the north-western Territory of 1787, now embraces the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan and Wisconsin, and it is opposed to divert the whole of the enormous and annually expanding trade of these vast countries through the channel of the St. Lawrence for shipment to Europe. Nor is the scheme visionary, but has many recommendations, among which relative distances are prime elements. The distance from Quebec to Liverpool is 475 miles less than from New York to Liverpool. Kingston, at the foot of Lake Ontario, is 125 miles nearer Liverpool than New York is. From Hamilton, at the head of Lake Ontario, is the same distance as from New York to Glasgow. From Lake Ontario, Erie, and the southern point of Huron, is nearly a straight line to the ports of Great Britain, through the St. Lawrence and the Straights of Belle Isle.

The sagacity of Washington foresaw this possible revolution in trade. In writing to a member of the national legislature, he urges the policy of preventing "the trade of the western territory from settling into the hands of either the Spaniards or the British." "If," he observed, "either of these happens, there is a line of speculation drawn between the eastern and western countries at once, the consequence of which may be fatal .....If then, the trade of that country should flow through the Mississippi or the St. Lawrence—if the inhabitants thereof should form commercial connections which we know, lead to connections of other kinds, they would in a few years be as unconnected with us as are those of South America. It may be asked how are we to prevent this?" In answer he recommended the extension of the inland navigation of the eastern waters, connecting them as nearly as possible with those which run westward; the opening of these to the Ohio; of those which extend from the Ohio to Lake Erie; and, these points accomplished, then he considered that his countrymen would not only draw the produce of the western settlers, but the peltry and fur trade of the Lakes.

As soon as the war of independence had been brought to a successful termination, the citizens of the new Republic desired to reach the unexplored territory of the west and utilise its natural resources. The plan proposed was the construction of canals, and Washington himself projected a plan which was to stretch to the west by ascending the Potomac. But this effort and some others failed, because public opinion was not sufficiently advanced, or because capital was wanting. At length the genius and energy of DeWitt Clinton, whose name will ever be honoured as one of the eminent benefactors of the United States, conceived and executed the plan of the Erie Canal connecting New York with Buffalo, and by this channel American enterprise had access to the western territory. The canal is 363 miles in length, and seven feet in depth. The original cost was $7,143,780, and the enlargement $12,989,861, being at the rate of £13,965 sterling per mile.—This truly magnificent work was commenced in 1817, and finished in 1825, and is remarkable proof of the spirit of the population, who then only numbered 1,300,000 souls.

The British Government, perceiving the value of internal trade to Upper Canada constructed the Welland Canal, which connects the Lake Ontario and Erie. The length of the main trunk is 28 miles; the junction branch to Dunville 21 miles, and the Broad Creek branch 1¼ miles, making altogether 50¼ miles. It is not sufficient for the traffic lying round Lake Erie, and now it is proposed to carry a ship canal from Ontario to Huron, a distance of 100 miles, by which the commerce of all the lakes would be brought into direct communication with the St. Lawrence. With equal spirit the merchants of Chicago are prepared to cut a canal 15 miles in length through the southern part of Michigan to avoid the dangerous navigation of the St. Clair Flats which connects Huron and Erie. The position of Chicago for commerce is most commanding. It is the principal part of Illinois standing on the south-western bend of Lake Michigan, at the head of navigation as regards the lakes. Its rapid advance is a wonder for in 1833 the Red Indian built his wigwam on its site, and the stag free and fearless, bounded over its plains. Lake Michigan opens to Chicago the trade of the south and south-west. Traversing about 100 miles to the head of the steamboat navigation on the Illinois River, it opens a water communication of 1700 miles to the Gulf of Mexico, and completes an inland navigation of 3300 miles to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, by way of Lakes, the Canada Canals and the St. Lawrence River; and also by way of the Lakes, the Erie Canal, and the Hudson River, to the city of New York, a distance of 3100 miles. The country surrounding Chicago, a mixture of woods and prairies, diversified with gentle slopes and irrigated with numerous clear streams, is the most fertile that can be imagined.

These rich territories demand an outlet to the Ocean to avoid the heavy cost of transhipment, and this can be effected by the junction of the Ontario and Huron by a ship canal. Goods could then be conveyed from Chicago to Liverpool and Glasgow without breaking bulk, and the same vessels that carried the agricultural products of the Far West to Britain would be freighted back with our manufactures. By this route the Erie Canal and the trading emporium of New York would encounter a formidable rival, and the fears of Washington might be realized. On these combinations Canadian energy has fixed its attention, and is eager to seize the advantages that present themselves both by land and water, by railways and canals. The Grand Trunk Railway, with an ocean terminus at Portland, in the State of Maine, never frozen, and the Great Western Railway, are magnificent undertakings; but when the ice does not impede, a complete system of Canals, giving a continuous passage from Chicago through the St. Lawrence, must bear away the palm. We are not writing of any distant future. All the facilities we have described are now available, and indeed many exist, for already a voyage has been made through the Lakes to Liverpool, through the Welland Canal, though the vessel was of modern burden; but a ship canal from Ontario to Huron of ample depth would completely revolutionise trade. Such are the brilliant prospects dawning upon Canada, and such are the new markets which may be opened up to our manufacturing industry.—The inauguration of a Conservative Government having released us from the turbulent rule of Lord Palmerston, we may hope to live in peace with our neighbors, and devote our thoughts and energies to the developement of the useful arts, both in India, and throughout our Colonial Empire.

Important from British Oregon.

THE NEW GOLD DIGGINGS!

We find the following important intelligence among the last news from California to the American papers. All the statements of the discovery of gold in British Oregon are confirmed.

Respecting the newly discovered gold diggings on Fraser's and Thompson's River the Olympia Pioneer says:—

"The extravagant reports are repeated concerning the richness of the diggings—that parties are making $8, $10, $15, $20, and $50 per day each, and we have heard it confidently asserted as a belief, founded upon prospecting and extensive personal examination, that the gold bearing region extends throughout a large extent of the country in both the British and American possessions, from Fraser's River to Fort Colville.

"The Hudson's Bay Company had, within a few months traded from the Indians some one hundred and ten pounds of coarse gold dust, of their own procuring from surface washing, with their own crude appliances. This statement, we understand, is fully confirmed by officers of the Hudson's Bay Company, which leaves no doubt as to its truth. All the hands which Col. Fitzhugh had in his employ in his coal mine, except three, had left for the gold region.

"The proprietors and agents of the steam lumbering establishments Northward, on the waters of the Sound, find it exceedingly difficult to meet their contracts in furnishing cargoes of lumber, &c.; and their embarrassment in this respect is increasing daily—as parties of their operatives are constantly leaving for Fraser's and Thompson's rivers, in company with permanent citizens of King Island, Kitsap, Jefferson, Whatcom and Clalm counties."

We learn that the steamer Constitution Capt. A. B. Group, on her way to San Francisco, landed at Port Townsend fifteen persons from different way ports bound for the gold mines. During the past week, we are told, fifteen persons deserted from the garrison at Fort Steilacoom, with the same destination in view. It appears that desertions have likewise occurred from Major Raine's command at Fort Townsend and at Fort Bellingham, and it is thought that a "stampede" will soon take place among the employees of the Northern Boundary Commission.

A correspondent of the Alta Californian estimates that the proceedings of these new diggings averages full $8 a man daily. The best day's work yet known was $213 for two men. The diggings are in British soil, just over the line, but it is believed that they extend to the south of the line also.

A correspondent of the Alta Californian says:—

The Hudson's Bay Company have the entire control of the navigable rivers in their territories. I would recommend all who intend visiting the mines to proceed to Victoria, take out their license, and there they will receive information connected with the gold diggings. Their license will be a kind of pass which will, I believe, be a benefit to the holders. I would strongly advise ship-owners not to allow their vessels to take freight up Frazer river. If they do, it is ten to one but they will be seized. This advice I have given to many, but they said "the Governor has not the power to enforce the law." They are mistaken. He has two vessels of war under his control, and the commanders of these vessels are bound to obey his orders, however unpleasant may be their feelings. Whenever John Bull's officials give an order, they must be obeyed. Therefore I recommend the public, whether they are natives of England or America, or of any other country, to be careful how they venture to navigate the rivers under the control of the Hudson's Bay Company without their consent.

The New York Times says:

"We are in possession of papers from Steilacoom and Olympia, W. T., up to the 9th April. They contain some interesting news regarding the gold discoveries on Frazer and Thompson Rivers, in the British possessions. The first news of the richness and extent of the diggings appears to be confirmed. Population continues to flock up Frazer River from all quarters. Desertions from Fort Steilacoom, on the Sound, have been frequent of late. Some of the deserters have been captured, and companies of soldiers were in pursuit of the others. The mill-hands were daily leaving Teekalet, although their places were being filled up by new men arriving from San Francisco, who apparently could not make up their minds, or had not the means, to proceed further on to the mines. There is a feverish state of excitement existing around the Sound, which bodes no good to steady, ordinary industry."

The Pioneer and Democrat publishes some extracts from a letter received by Surveyor General Tilton, from his brother, Mr. Hanson Tilton, dated Fort Langley: (some forty miles up Frazer River) March 23. The writer was then en route for the diggings, with goods, provisions, and mining tools. He says:

"We arrived here yesterday, and were eight days in coming from Bellingham Bay, five of which were spent in finding the mouth of Frazer River. We bought a schooner of 200 tons burden at Bellingham Bay, but can proceed no further up the river with it than this place, and will start for Fort Hope in two or three days with canoes.—There is quite an excitement here about the mines, and there is said to be from 150 to 200 miners at work in them. They are all at work at present on Frazer River. The Indians are working on Thompson river. I have seen $800, which three men said they procured by ten days' labor.

I would advise persons coming to these mines to come in canoes, and buy their provisions at Fort Langley. They can purchase them here much cheaper than they can bring them up themselves in large boats, as they can get no further up in large boats than this place, and canoes are very scarce here.

It is 150 or 200 miles from Bellingham Bay to the mines. It is 40 miles from Bellingham Bay to Semiamoo; 20 to the mouth of Frazer; 40 to Fort Langley; 50 to Fort Hope; and 40 to the mines on Frazer River."

THE SURVEY OF THE BRITISH AMERICAN FRONTIER.—An expedition to survey the Oregon boundary of the British possessions from Vancouver's Island to Lake Ontario, across the Rocky Mountains, has been organized, and will sail on the 1st of next month for their destination via Chagres and across the Isthmus of Panama, thence by steam to the Gulf of Georgia, where the expedition will commence its labors by tracing the 49th degree of North latitude. The force consists of Lieutenant-Colonel Hawkins, R. E., chief commissioner; Captain Haig, R. A., chief assistant; and sixty-five non-commissioned officers of the Royal Engineers, who are topographers, photographers, &c., and thirty Hudson's Bay axemen. The expedition will probably require from three to four years to perform their laborious and arduous services.

EASTERN RUSSIA.—The Government has just received from the governor of the Russian possessions on the river Amour a very favourable report on the military and commercial situation of the vast territory which has been there definitely annexed to the Russian empire. Formidable batteries have been raised at the mouth of the Amour, so as to be able to defend the entrance against hostile fleets. Commerce during the last year has acquired an unexpected degree of development. The discovery of a mine of coal of very good quality in the Island of Sagalien will contribute not a little to extend the navigation of Russia in the Pacific Ocean.

CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP OF KINGSTON.—On Saturday last, in St. Patrick's Church the Rev. Mr. Horan of the Laval University, was consecrated Bishop of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Kingston. The ceremony was one of great pomp and splendour, and drew together an audience numbering six-thousand. The consecration ceremony commenced at eight o'clock, A. M. and lasted until 10 o'clock, P. M.—Herald.

OTTAWA.—We learn that the attention of Seat of Government has received quite a large accession to its population since the promulgation of the intention of the Government to carry out the Queen's decision. Some idea may be formed of the addition made to its population when we state—which we do on good authority—that in the Protestant Episcopal Church there were formerly several pews empty every Sunday, whereas now there are none without occupants, and between thirty and forty families desire but cannot obtain pews at any price. The city is reported to exhibit signs of business activity to a degree never before known. A good deal of property has changed hands, rents have augmented considerably, and owners of houses generally refuse to extend leases beyond twelve months. This evidently shows a disposition to increase the rents after that interval, should the demand for houses justify it. No doubt they will take advantage of their position, and extort all they can, as has been done in other cities under like circumstances.—Kingston News.

HOW TO SAVE A LEAKY SHIP FROM SINKING.—The attention of many practical men in this community has recently been drawn to a consideration of the best means of providing against or averting the foundering of a ship at sea, and quite a number of suggestions have been thrown out through the press. The subject is one of the deepest importance, and anything that promises a greater degree of safety than is now had must prove valuable. In connexion with this subject we were waited upon yesterday by a French gentleman whose name we are not at liberty to disclose, and placed in the possession of the following particulars:—Some time ago a slaver, named the "Three Friends," while making a trip from the Coast of Africa to Bahia, in Brazil, with 300 negroes on board, was seen and chased by an English frigate. Finding the frigate overhauling her, the captain of the "Three Friends" came up with the lee-yards of his standing rigging, which was then strapped in to the mast, a short distance from the mastheads, the wedges were slackened around the

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE
AND
LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

THE DIRECTORS of the Peterborough Mechanics Institute and Library Association respectfully invite the co-operation of the inhabitants of the Town and vicinity to the sustaining of a good READING ROOM and LIBRARY in their midst. The advantages of such must be so evident to every one, that they do not consider it necessary to urge them here. About 100 Papers and Periodicals from different parts of the Canadas and the United States, are received weekly in the Reading Room; and it is intended, should sufficient encouragement be received, to procure in addition to these as an early day, some of the leading British Newspapers. The Library contains 900 volumes, to which additions are constantly being made. The terms of subscription have been placed very low so as to place the advantages within the reach of every person in the community. To shareholders the subscription is only $1 per annum; to non-shareholders there is to be 25 cents per week; payable quarterly in advance. Subscriptions will be received, and any other information given on application at the Secretary at the Reading Room, Next the Telegraph Office, Burnham's Block.

THE GREAT WONDER OF THE AGE—A NEW ERA DAWNING upon the USERS OF PEN and INK. A valuable and wonderful discovery

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK.

An entirely new article, by the discovery of which Pen and Ink are rendered useless. It can be used as a

Writing, Copying, or Indelible Ink

For either of which it can truly be called the ne plus ultra of the kind. For

Writing

It possesses all the beauty of fluid Ink. It is jet black, and so permanent as not to be removed by the strongest oxalic acid. Hence its great value in writing deeds, wills, and other valuable papers. As it will not blot nor crack, it is highly commendable for the use of book-keepers and writers generally. For

Copying,

It works wonderfully. Three, or even four copies can be made at one writing, thus dispensing with the copying machines and the trouble attending it. By a process recently discovered, embroidery patterns, pictures, etc, can be copied acurately on cloth, wood, steel, or any hard substance. For

Printing,

Postmasters and users of stamping apparatus generally value it highly. It matters not how coarse the operation, a legible impression is invariably made. Its permanency makes is particularly valuable for stamping clothes.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK

Is put up in packages arranged especially for the travelling community. It can be carried in the pocket, and used at any time. There is no pen required for using it, but it contains in itself everything requisite for persons desiring to correspond with their friends. Every one will find this as represented. As many may be inclined to class the "Portable" as one of the many humbugs of the day, we agree to send a sample package to any one for twenty-five cents, or the same amount in postage stamps. Do you wish for Honourable, Genteel, and Lucrative Employment?

We wish to engage agents for the sale of this celebrated Ink, and can assure all that they will find no better employment or more money-making business than this, and hoping that you will carefully consider it, we await your orders.

TERMS.

To local or travelling agents, we offer the following inducements: For Two Dollars we will send any one two packages of the Ink by mail, and prepay postage on the same; and also we will send full and explicit directions for making, putting up and selling the article.

Any one can make and sell enough to remunerate him for his outlay in a single day.

Pay of the Business.

It is unnecessary to say anything of the money that can be made in this business. It is entirely new and in great demand. Any person can make and put up a thousand packages a day, which will cost three dollars, and which retail at twenty-five cents each, making a profit of two hundred and forty-seven dollars.

☞ No agent will be confined to a single county, but may sell wherever he chooses. You can realize from three to five dollars per day. We wish it understood, that no deviation from the above will be made. Orders solicited.—Address,

ARTIFICIAL STONE.
Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavour to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The many experiments and specimens made by me, as I presume demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregates of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices, Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanitary and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

young and undeveloped country like Canada, into which there was being day after day imported people of all nations. It was easy to excite party feeling, and the man who had a glib tongue, and could raise a political storm, would find it easy to ride on the surface of that strife into the Parliament of the country. He believed that the best policy in a "finished" country was to raise the standard of voters and abolish the property qualification of members, but this principle could not apply to a new country like Canada.

Hon. Mr. De Blaquiere said this was not the first time the subject had been discussed in this House, and he had always held, and he maintained now, that so far from abolishing the property qualification, it should be raised very much higher, because he held that a man who possessed property should have the most ample means of protecting that property. (Hear, hear.) With regard to this House in particular the property qualification was an essential ingredient, seeing that this was the highest Court of appeal in the country.

Hon. Mr. Ferguson said the country looked to the members of this House as grave, staid, and respectable men, who would not pass hasty measures, and he felt convinced that the country would not be satisfied by their passing a Bill which would have the effect of opening the doors of Parliament to all persons, no matter what was their position or standing in society.

Hon. Mr. Moore held it was essential that the present qualification of members to serve in Parliament should be continued particularly as regards this House, which might be termed the Conservative branch of the Legislature. Take away the property qualification, and clamorous demagogues, birds of passage, and men who followed politics as a trade, would be everywhere thrusting themselves forward as candidates for admission into the Legislative Council.

Hon. Mr. Patton said of all the measures which had come before the House, this was the most extraordinary. It was notorious that in Canada any man who possessed a fair modicum of common sense might, after some four or five years' residence, acquire property to the amount of one or two thousand pounds. That being the case, ought they to break down the only barrier which now existed to prevent any but frugal and industrious men from becoming the law-makers of the country? Surely not. He contended that this was not a really liberal measure, even though it professed to be so. Why did not his hon. friend bring in a Bill to make the suffrage universal?

Hon. Col. Prince—That will come next. (Laughter.)

Hon. Mr. Patton—And this was but an instalment. Would his hon. friend also introduce a Bill to provide for voting by ballot?

Hon. Col. Prince—That, also, will come in due time. (Laughter.)

Hon. Mr. Patton—The House now knew that his hon. friend held socialist views, and therefore there was no knowing what might not be the future productions of his very fertile brain. Had his hon friend proposed to give literature a representation by providing for the admission of members from the Universities he would have gone with him.

Hon. Mr. Quesnel said the hon. member wanted to have brains introduced into the Legislature in preference to money; but the effect of his Bill would be liberty to bring in people who possessed neither money nor brains. (Hear, hear.) Had he introduced a clause against the payment of members, he might have looked upon the measure with some degree of favor.

Hon. Col. Prince said if the hon. gentleman who spoke last, and those other members who held similar views, would only permit the Bill to go to a second reading, he would introduce a clause which should have the effect of doing away with the payment of members. He saw the feeling of the House was against him; but he thought he had laid a basis for liberal legislation.

The yeas and nays were then called for, and the only member who voted for the second reading was the introducer of the Bill.

The non-contents numbered 18. The Bill was consequently lost.

The House then adjourned until Tuesday, Monday being the Queen's birth-day.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Friday, May 21.

Mr. R. F. GOURLAY.

Mr. Munro moved that Robert Fleming Gourlay, Esq., be heard at the bar of this House in his own defence on Wednesday, the 2nd June.

Mr. Mackenzie supported the motion. He said that Mr. Gourlay had done a good service to the country, when Upper Canada was young, but had been requitted with ill usage. On his return to London he had published the best account of Canada that had ever appeared. He was as true to the British Crown as any man that ever breathed. That such a man should have to complain of wrongs done him, and that at eighty years of age he should be denied a hearing at the bar of the House would be harsh and cruel.

Atty. Gen. Macdonald said that a man could not be heard at the bar, if there was no charge against him. Any claims he had to prefer could best be made by a written statement.

Hon. J. S. Macdonald said the House had already atoned for any wrongs Mr. Gourlay had suffered. They had given him a pension of £50, and had gone as far as it was possible to go. He did not think the time of the House should be occupied with hearing him at the bar.

Mr. Foley said that a real, full and substantial measure of justice had not yet been done to Mr. Gourlay. He was at one period most unjustly dealt with by being banished from the country, without having committed a crime worthy of banishment. For what was in those days held to be a crime was now acknowledged as an effort on his part to gain for the people of Canada those liberties which they now enjoyed. There still stood against him the sentence pronounced upon him illegally, unconstitutionally, and improperly, and all he asked was the reversal of that unjust sentence, so far as this House was concerned. He (Mr. Foley) thought this request should be granted.

Hon. Mr. Scoutt admitted the injustice done to Mr. Gourlay, but did not think the course now proposed was the proper one to set the wrong right.

Mr. Brown supported the motion for hearing Mr. Gourlay at the bar, and read extracts from the report of a Committee of the House of Assembly, in 1841, prepared by Dr. Dunlop. The report stated that Mr. Gourlay visited Canada in 1817—that he became aware of the existence of various abuses, and proposed that a commission should be appointed to proceed to Great Britain to have these abuses rectified—that he published a pamphlet, which, by those in power, was considered to have a seditious tendency—that he was put upon his trial at Kingston, for sedition, and acquitted—that he was again tried at Brockville, with a similar result—that he was afterwards arrested, and kept for five weeks in gaol at Niagara, awaiting his trial, during the dog-days, which so completely prostrated him in body and mind, that he was unfit to conduct his defence, and, being convicted, was banished from the province for life, on the pain of death if he returned. On this report the House of Assembly reversed the sentence and granted him a pension. But Mr. Gourlay was not satisfied with this, and said—"I do not want mercy, but justice. I do not want to have the sentence merely revered, but to have it declared that it was unjust from the beginning, that I may not go down to my grave with this stain resting on my children." Mr. Gourlay was now old and feeble, although at one period a man of much vigor, and it was not likely to detain the House at any length, and he (Mr. B.) thought it would be ungracious on the part of the House to refuse his request.

Hon. Mr. Sicotte said that, if the member for Toronto was of opinion that Mr. Gourlay was unjustly condemned, and that something further was necessary to be done, instead of moving that he be heard at the bar, he should introduce a Bill.

Mr. Brown said that any such action should proceed from the Crown. If he introduced a Bill, it would be an act of hostility to the Government, complaining that they had not done Mr. Gourlay justice.—Would the Government say that they were prepared to grant what Mr. Gourlay asked.

Hon. Mr. Sicotte replied in the negative.

Mr. Dorion thought that justice had not been done to Mr. Gourlay in the words of the report of the Committee of the House of Assembly. That report recommended that the Crown should repudiate the proceedings against Mr. Gourlay, and that Parliament should declare the sentence pronounced against him to be null and void.—This was a very different thing from a pardon which supposed an offence. He thought probably the best thing would be for the friends of Mr. Gourlay to bring in a Bill, or to move an address recommending the Government to bring in such a Bill.

Hon. J. S. Macdonald had no wish to prevent Mr. Gourlay from getting justice, but he did object to giving so much importance to this affair, as to occupy the time of the House by hearing him at the bar.—He read the several proceedings of the House of Parliament which had taken place through a long course of years, and contended that the House had fully considered the whole subject. The Government, too, had pardoned Mr. Gourlay, and had shown their sense of the wrong done him by offering a pension. What could be done more?

Let the precise thing which Mr. Gourlay wanted be stated.

Mr. Mackenzie said that Mr. Merritt—no visionary—had made a similar motion to this in the last Parliament, and it only lost by one vote. He did not think the House understood the case of Mr. Gourlay. There was a feeling at one time to keep out the Irish Catholics from this country, and an Act, the 44th King, was passed to enable any man to be driven away from the country on the simple order of any member of the Legislature, or magistrate. He did not know how many Irish Catholics were driven away under this bill; but at last Mr. Gourlay came, and wanting to make some improvements he was sued for libel, and at last, when no jury could be found to convict, was banished under this 44th of the King. Mr. Gourlay was a man of honour, a graduate of the Edinburgh University, and not like people to whom money was everything. He, therefore, refused to accept their pension, and required that the stain of crime should be wiped away from his memory. Let the House hear the old man by all means. It would occupy very little time and would be doing a generous action.

The motion was carried by a vote of 41 to 38.

Nays—Messrs. Alleyn, Baby, Benjamin, J. Cameron, M. Cameron, Carling, Caron, Cayley, Atty. Gen. Cartier, Cimon, Connor, Coutlee, Desaulniers, Dionne, Dufresne, Ferguson, Gill, Hogan, Labelle, Lacoste, Le Boutillier, Lemieux, Loranger, Macbeth, Atty. Gen. Macdonald, J. S. Macdonald, McCann, Playfair, Robinson, Solicitor General Rose, Sicotte, Simard, S. Smith, Somerville, Tasse, Thibaudeau, Wallbridge, and Webb—38.

Mr. Brown—The Government have been beaten, and Mr. Gourlay is to be sent for. (Laughter.)

Mr. Foley gave notice that on Wednesday he would introduce a Bill to declare the unjust sentence of banishment passed upon Robert Gourlay, null and void.

Britain and America.—The Right of Search.

The statements just published relative to the boarding of American vessels by British cruisers in the Gulf of Mexico, announce the commencement of a difficulty more serious than any that has occurred to interfere with the friendly relations of the two countries for many years. The right of search seems to have been exercised, not only in a manner offensive to American feeling, but under circumstances which are most unfavourable to a pacific solution of the difficulty that has thereby been created. On the coast of Africa vessels sailing under American colors may be overhauled on suspicion without exciting much remark; but when the scene is transferred to American seas, and above all, to the neighborhood of Cuba, the case is entirely different, and such interference on whatever grounds, is certain to arouse the angry feelings of the American people. When to this we add, that the Administration is so situated at present that it may be supposed not unwilling to make political capital by appealing to such feeling, and that the difficulty is one which may be turned to account to promote the Democratic design upon Cuba, the serious nature of the complications must be fully apparent.

We are very far from coinciding with those who, viewing the matter from an English point of view, are inclined to pooh pooh American indignation as unreasonable and out of place. The case is not one which can be disposed of in such a way. American jealousy of British interference is not to be made light of. The feeling is too natural and too well founded, and Jonathan very properly will not submit to be pooh poohed, or fired into by John Bull. Of that determination we entirely approve, and we desire to see it more respected that it has hitherto been by the British Government, whose stupid forgetfulness on this point has more than once brought the two governments to the verge of hostilities.

In face of the mutual understanding that has existed with reference to the right of search the proceedings complained of are not likely to be justified on satisfactory grounds. The utmost we can hope for is that they may be explained in such a way as to mollify American feeling. This, however, will be no easy matter. Mr. Buchanan's adherents, more especially in the South, the supporters of slavery, annexations, and filibustering, comprising a large proportion of the North as well, will not be unwilling to make the most of a difficulty which promises to promote their own views and interest. The anti-slavery party will say as we ourselves do, "if the American Government is aggrieved by British inspection of American ships, why not make provision to render such inspection unnecessary?" If this Government is sincere in its professed desire to put a stop to the slave trade, why should it leave the business of doing so entirely to British cruisers, at that very point where the risk is greatest of a difficulty arising through such neglect? That is not only the anti-slavery view, but it is also the British sentiment on the subject, and while on this ground we cannot actually defend the proceedings complained of, there is at all events reason for a counter complaint against the American Government. After all, this reasonable view may have the full weight to which it is entitled. Among our daily cotemporaries it seems to be the one that is already most generally entertained; the Herald being almost left alone, as usual, in its loud demand for war.

We scarcely think that Mr. Buchanan and General Cass, much as their popularity stands in need of repair, will have recourse to the desperate measures which the Herald so promptly advises. Desirable as it may be to unite the Democratic party, it is not in the least probable that the occupation will be turned to account in such a manner as will precipitate actual hostilities. Opportunity will doubtless be afforded for explanation and apology, and in the interchange of diplomatic notes the excitement will have the usual opportunity to evaporate. We do not suppose that the Government can seriously contemplate turning this affair to any more serious account, and if they do not make a mess of it altogether in the way the Herald recommends, it is possible enough that the issue of the business may be a clear gain to the Administration, that it may strengthen their position with their own party, and further the views which they are well known to entertain with reference to Cuba. The fact of that island being under a government which has permitted the landing of 30,000 slaves upon its shores during the past year, is a point which may be worked to great advantage in connection with the difficulty that has now arisen. Abandoning the difficulty that has hitherto been maintained in diplomatic communications, the United States Government may represent that the position is the same, but would be at once and forever removed if the island were ceded to America. What the result of such a proposal might be it is impossible to predict, but it appears to us that it would be more unreasonable for Britain to give any violent opposition to such a proposal than for the American Government to make it. In all cases in which American and British tendencies, to annexation on the one hand, and to Quixotic intervention on the other, threaten to come into collision, when the subject in dispute is the possession of ground on the southern part of this Continent, or immediately adjoining, we are disposed to be in favor of the Yankee claim; and this is the view which, in spite of British prejudice, has in the long run generally guided the British counsels. It accords with that belief in the "manifest destiny" of the Anglo-Saxon race which more than political considerations sways the public mind of England.

Autobiography of Commissioner Yeh.

Yeh has himself given us a sketch of his life, which, obscure in the outset, is likely to end in obscurity; for, according to late accounts, his recent conduct has been condemned by the Emperor, and he is visited with degradation from his rank.

While on board the Inflexible, just before he was taken from Hong-Kong to Calcutta, an English officer elicited from him the following history:—

"I was born in the village of Kosh-Tib, in the province of Ho-Nan. My father was a basketmaker, and eked out his income by trading in rice. We were 14 children. At an early age I acquired a taste for reading, and whenever I had any money I expended it in the purchase of books. After a few years I was considered as a man of learning among the boys of my age, and when the Inspector General of Public Instruction, who visited our province every five years, came, I asked to be allowed to undergo an examination. My request was granted. I came into the schools with an elaborate commentary on the Ta-Hio, the great book of science of Confubius, and after three days' successive examination, I was appointed a "literate" of the third class, and attached as tutor to the college of Khai-Fang, the chief town in the province. The mandarin governor of Ho-Nan's attention was directed to me, and he chose me as his secretary. Two years later he was summoned to the capital, and took me with him. During my sojourn in Pekin, I acquired the degree of literate of the second and of the first class. My patron died, but I had been noticed by the head of the Nuyko, in whose hands also rested the direction of the Emperor's "Cabinet," and attained the post of Vice-President of the Hing-Pou, or Tribunal of Punishment. I won no small distinction in the discharge of the duties of this office, and in two missions which I was subsequently entrusted with, I had the honor of being noticed by the Sublime Sovereign who rules over us. Finally, in 1847, I was associated with the very worthy and much-regretted Houang-Nyang-Toong, who was invested with the governament of Canton. The country was then a prey to a terrible insurrection, which it was necessary to suppress. The insurgents burnt towns and villages, and slaughtered the inhabitants by thousands. It was necessary to stop them. The Viceroy Sin, with whom we were, gave no quarter to the rebels, and was thus enabled to keep the insurrection within due bounds. He died in 1853, and I succeeded him I followed his example, and the rebellion gradually gave way."

Polite exception being taken to the cruelties which he practised against the rebels, he said:—

"Hear me. One of the rebel chiefs was in the habit of having all the prisoners he took sawn between two planks. I informed him that I would use reprisals, and have his people put to death in the same way; but he had previously had no less than 6,000 men, many of them officers, sawn between two planks."

English officer—"How many prisoners do you think you have executed?"

Yeh—"About 80,000; but the rebels have slaughtered more than 200,000."

"Yes but many people put to death who had nothing to do with the insurrection?"

"Why, fancy. The province of Canton is a kind of refuge for all thieves and murderers in the empire who escape from justice. I saw that certain wars were frequent, and therefore ordered frequent executions; but the people thus put to death were always thieves and murderers, who almost invariably confessed their crimes."

"You don't seem to be popular in the city."

"I never discovered that I was unpopular. I knew the people feared me and kept quiet. The public peace in the city was never disturbed, trade prospered, and people grew rich. The Emperor, my immortal master, to reward me, had conferred upon me the title Wan-tsio, the highest of all, and had authorized me to take the surname of Mingle-Chin. As to the reproach of having availed myself of my position to accumulate wealth, it is false. I am rich in dignities and titles, but poor in money. A great deal of my income I send to my friends and relatives. In the village where I was born I have had a temple built at my own expense, and have had several dwellings erected for poor families. My enemies are chiefly in the upper classes. They wish for my downfall in order to take my place."

The fallen Viceroy, we are further informed, "is very simple and regular in his tastes and habits; highly courteous and polite in his manners; does not drink as a general rule; never smokes opium; never appears to evince the slightest concern about his fate; is a Blenddist; prays regularly twice a day with his head eastwards; sleeps a good deal; smokes a good deal; talks little; appears much esteemed by his attendants and the higher class of Chinese; of course is an abstemate as a pig, and hates as cordially. His food is chiefly rice, ducks, pork, salted eggs, and some other curious Chinese delicacies; of course he won't eat beef. His drink is chiefly hot weak tea. He has never tasted cold water in his life and declares a drink of it would kill him.

The arrival of the Inflexible in Singapore Roads, with Yeh on board, caused a certain sensation among the Chinese population. The Inflexible having struck on her arrival, a rumor was set abroad that it was intended to drown the Viceroy, but it fell naturally when the tide floated the ship off.

The Government of India.

Whatever be the advantages which the country may derive from the prolonged tenure of office which the Government have obtained by adopting the proposition of Lord John Russell to substitute Resolutions for a Bill on the Government of India, we are inclined to think that we are destined to buy them rather dear. The stage on which Parliament is employed at present resembles nothing so much as those remote geological periods in which the foundation of the present order of things was laid, but which it requires a very powerful effort of the imagination to connect with the world in which we now live. Suppose us well through the Resolutions—and any one who looks at the sheet of amendments and considers the proceedings of Friday night must be aware how desperate a supposition that is—we are then only at the beginning of our work—only at the point at which most measures make their appearance on the public stage. We are spinning the thread that is to envelope the grub which one day or other is to be metamorphosed into a butterfly. There is not a step which Parliament is taking which will not have to be repeated, not a speech which will not be made over again, not an argument which will not be re-urged and re-answered. Debate begets debate, and one delay engenders another. The dilatory motion of Friday night is sure to be repeated at convenient intervals. The Directors will again reiterate their defence against charges which nobody has thought it worth while to make, and their praise of virtues which it has been nobody's concern to dispute. Mr. Gladstone will urge again the undoubted right of leaders whose title is perfect in law, and not injured in equity, to additional security for an imaginary breach of faith, and Mr. Horsman will again assume the attitude of a penitent, in order to utter confessions damaging to his pretended allies. In the meanwhile one Resolution has been passed, and, if we are to take this as a specimen of the whole, the prospect is not encouraging. It begins with a non sequitur, and ends with an absolute misstatement. It does not follow that, because the territories of the Company are to remain under its government only till Parliament shall otherwise provide, it is expedient to make the transfer; nor is it true that when the transfer has been made the whole empire will be placed under one executive authority. These things though pointed out, were not remedied, and we congratulate the Government on the vigour which has enabled them to carry, in the face of what professes to be a hostile majority, a Resolution in contravention alike of logic and fact.

More interesting, however, than fruitless repining over a waste of time which there is probably no disposition in the present state of parties to employ any better purpose, will it be to point out the principal issues which will occupy the attention of Parliament during the Indian discussion. First comes the question whether the new Indian Minister shall be a President or a Secretary of State, which seems mainly to turn on the point whether it is expedient that an Indian Minister becoming Secretary of State or a Secretary of State becoming Indian Minister, should take out a new patent and undergo a new election. Then comes the proposition to prohibit the Indian Minister from acting without having obtained this opinion in writing of at least three of his Council, which, applying to all matters, small as well as great, would probably induce us to desire a return to the comparative celerity and efficiency of the present double government. Mr. Rich proposes a President, Vice-President, and five Commissioners,—one to superintend correspondence and the other four to look after a Presidency apiece, the Vice-President taking care of finance,—an effectual provision, as it would seem, against bringing to bear on any one subject all the amount of knowledge that is available.—Mr. Cumming Bruce wishes that the Secretary of State should be assisted by the present Board of Directors, who are to have all the powers which they now have,—a proposition flatly contradicting the one Resolution already passed. Major Stuart Wortley wishes that at least one-third of the Council should be naval or military men in the Company's service,—a regulation which will give these services four members out of Lord John Russell's proposed number of eleven. So much by way of prelude. We now arrive at the more serious business of the Committee. Lord John Russell proposes that the Council shall consist of not more than eleven members, exclusive of the President; that such members shall be appointed by her Majesty; that they shall hold office during good behaviour, and that all clerks and cadets shall be appointed by a public competition.

Lord Palmerston has given notice of an amendment to carry out the second of these propositions—the principle of appointment, instead of election. As to the number of the Council, we prefer a large to a small number—Lord John's alarm to Lord Palmerston's pit—but the question of nomination or election involves, as we have shown, matters of the very highest moment, on which the opposite sides of the House are irreconcilably committed to absolutely contrary views. It would be foreign to our present purpose, which is rather to inform readers as to the questions which are likely to be debated than to offer opinions of our own, to recapitulate what has been already said on this subject, nor do we now think it necessary to enter into the question as to whether it be requisite or proper to give to the subordinate members of an executive department that security of tenure which has been bestowed upon the Judges of the land. The question of patronage has in it more novelty, and has been less exhausted by a previous discussion. It is not very easy to understand how clerkships and cadetships can be open to public competition, reserving one-fourth to the sons of persons employed in the service of the Indian Government. Is it intended that there should be two competitions, one open to all her Majesty's subjects, the other to the sons of Indian employees, three-fourths to be elected by competition from one, and one-fourth from competition from the other? Or are three-fourths to be competed for and one-fourth given away; or, if any sons of Indian employees get commissions by public competition, are they to be deducted from the remaining fourth? One thing seems pretty clear—that, whatever may become of ordinary Cavalry and Infantry cadetships, the House of Commons, which has just decided that the commissions in the Royal Artillery and Engineers shall be attainable only by public competition, is not likely to apply to India a rule different from that which it has just laid down for England. Mr. Bowyer wishes to present Her Majesty with a new title in virtue of her new empire, and Sir Edward Colebrooke to give to the council all the attributes of double government, and place it as nearly as possible in the position of the old Directors. Colonel Sykes wishes to pledge the new Government against any retrenchment of pay, pensions, or allowances; to obtain an Imperial guarantee of the Indian Debt; to allow the members of Council to sit in Parliament; and to provide compensation for the abolished offices.

When we consider that this is only a preliminary discussion, and that the only result of its termination will be to introduce a Bill in the Committee in which every one of these points may and probably will be fought over again, we may be excused for looking with some apprehension at the prospect before us, and wishing our legislators, ourselves, and our readers a safe deliverance. Luxuries, however, are not to be got for nothing, and, as we have determined to indulge in government by a minority, we must not grudge the price of the entertainment. Indeed, after all, there may be time enough before us, as Her Majesty's Ministers have discreetly abstained from introducing any measure which might for a moment compete for public attention with the Resolutions, first, second and third readings and Committee of the yet unborn Indian Bill No. 3.—London Times.

News by the "Fulton" and "Niagara."

GREAT BRITAIN.

In the House of Commons on Monday May 3rd, Mr. Vance asked the Attorney General if his attention had been called to the present state of the mercantile law of Canada, which sanctions preferential assignments of debtors' effects, without affording any means of redress to the general body of the creditors. The Attorney General said the matter was entirely within the province of the Canadian Legislature.

On the 5th inst., the House of Commons passed to a second reading the Bill legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister, by forty majority.

On the 6th, in reply to an inquiry, Mr. Disraeli said that no revision of the commercial relations of Turkey had taken place since the war, but that one would probably soon commence. He also stated, in reply to an enquiry by Mr. Bright as to the proclamation of the Governor General of India, confiscating the soil of Oude, that the government had sent out a despatch disapproving of the policy of the Governor General in this matter in every respect.

The bill abolishing the property qualification for members of Parliament, was debated and passed to a second reading, amidst great cheering. The question is regarded as an important one in Parliamentary reform, and meets with government support.

In the House of Lords, Lord Ebury moved for a commission to consider the propriety of modifying the Liturgy of the Church of England, but subsequently withdrew his motion.

On the 7th instant, in the House of Lords, Lord Ellenborough produced a copy of the Governor General of India's proclamation, and the government dispatch in condemnation of the Governor's action.

Earl Granville deprecated the production of the dispatch and defended Lord Canning, predicting that he would not submit to the affront upon him.

The Earl of Derby defended the action of the government, stating that they felt bound to object to the sweeping confiscation of landed property in Oude which Lord Canning had proclaimed.

Several other members spoke on the subject.

In the House of Commons Mr. Kinglake asked when the dispatch received from Sardinia, "cordially concurring in Lord Malmesbury's dispatch, and a copy of the latter despatch would be presented to the House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer repeated that there was a perfect agreement between Great Britian and Sardinia with respect to the course to be taken for the solution of the present difficulty. That agreement, however, did not imply that everything had been arranged. In the present state of negociations the papers could not be produced. If the House had not confidence in the government pending the negociations, let them say so.

Lord John Russell thought the House had no reason to be dissatisfied with the course taken by the government. It had been judicious, and he was hopeful that it would be successful. He asked what was to become of the crew of the "Cagliari." It would not be consistent with the character of the country to permit these men to remain in prison pending the negociations.

Mr. S. Fitzgerald, in reply, said the government had included in their representations the crew of the "Cagliari."

The subject of the government of India was taken up, and further progress made on the resolutions proposed by the government.

The great Chester cup race was won by Sir C. Mash's "Vanity," in a field of 28 horses.

The London "Times" is authorized to state that Sir Colin Campbell is to be created a peer, in consequence of his distinguished services.

The Court of Queen's Bench refused the application of the British Bank Directors for a new trial. Lord Campbell said the jury were justified in their verdict. All the facts of the case were uncontradicted, and he sincerely hoped that the prosecution would have a salutary effect upon the commercial transactions.

At the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society in London, a resolution was unanimously adopted to disseminate as far as possible Scriptural instruction in India.

The London "Times," in its city article, has some lengthy remarks on the extension of the United States southward, and says in effect that absorption of the weaker republics of Central and South America by the United States cannot be long delayed, should America now pursue the course that seems imminent. The charge as regards the English interest, assuming that she will honestly provide for the existing debts of the various States in question, cannot but be a great improvement upon their present position.

The writer thinks that far more opposition will be shown to the extension at home than abroad.

The long projected European and American Submarine Telegraph Company, via the Azores, were about issuing their proposals for laying their cable.

A meeting of one hundred and twenty liberal members of the House of Commons, had been held, and had adopted resolutions declaring that they could not express satisfaction with the government; that no future government will be worthy of support which does not manifest an earnest zeal and sincerity in promising measures of improvement and reform; and that every government wishing to have the confidence of the liberal party should be established on a wider basis.

The Bank of England had made no change in the rate of discount. The outflow of bullion to France had checked the expectation. The demand for discounts had subsided, and applications were very light.

The London Times' city article of the 7th inst. says:—The funds showed no diminution of firmness, although the withdrawals of the government for the Continent continue on rather a considerable scale—about sixty-eight thousand pounds having been taken from the bank during the day. Consols were buoyant at a trifle under the highest figure. Proposals are advertised for London subscriptions to a Swedish loan of one million two hundred and twenty-eight thousand pounds, for the construction of a railway, at four per cent interest.

FRANCE.

Trade in France continued to show symptoms of improvement. Increased orders from the United States had reached Lyons.

A prominent supporter of Cavaignac's government had left Paris, to remain away until after the elections were over, and it was surmised that his departure was not voluntary.

Paris letters state that the Emperor, at a reception, had rebuked one of the deputies for expressing himself strongly in opposition to the government plans in the Legislature, and that the incident was much spoken of.

RUSSIA.

Details of the arrangements for the abolition of serfdom are published. Three successive periods are indicated for the completion of the measure, and the serfs are to remain attached to the property until they purchased their freedom.

INDIA.

Full details of the scenes following the fall of Lucknow are published.

The son of one of the Begums and two or three ladies of the Zenana were killed by a discharge of musketry, when the doors were burst in, before the soldiers saw that they were women. The plunder and destruction of property seems to have been immense. The troops had been exposed to great labor before the city.

Strong measures were at last taken to preserve order in the city, and prevent plunder. It was expected that 8,000 men would have to be left to garrison Lucknow.

Symptoms were observable of a gathering cloud in the northwest, and preventative measures were urged for fear of a sudden outbreak of the Sikhs.

Sir James Outram had issued a proclamation declaring that the British government had no intention to carry on armed propagandism, as was believed among the natives; and the Governor General had issued a proclamation promising rewards to those who had been faithful, and calling on others to submit and throw themselves on the mercy of the British government. He confiscates all the estates of the latter, but pronounces that their lives shall be spared, if they are not guilty of shedding murderous blood.

The Paris Pays affirms that in a private dispatch Sir Colin Campbell has urgently demanded large and immediate reinforcements, on account of the great losses his army has sustained by sickness and the enemy's fire.

The Pays says that notwithstanding the taking of Lucknow, Oude is still in full insurrection and revolt, and instead of being trodden out, extends daily.

The Attitude of France.

For the second or third time within a few years a vague apprehension prevails of hostile intentions on the part of the Government of France. The Emperor has raised his army from 500,000 to 600,000 men. He has also called into active service a large body of seamen, and is ingreasing the strength of his navy far beyond the ordinary requirements of a military power. These measures, however, though suspicious, especially when the French finances are low, and when fresh expenditure would be naturally avoided, might be explained by reference to the inveterate military vanity of the French people, and the general tendencies of that "Napoleonic idea" of which the Emperor is the present impersonation. But the construction, which appears to be going on, of large vessels adapted for landing troops, of great power and with shot-proof sides, seems to point so directly towards an intended visit of amity to some neighbouring maritime friend, that our Government will probably think it desirable to inquire the destination of the armament of which these vessels are to form a part. They will receive in return abundance of assurances and caresses. Meantime they have had what the papers of the Peace-at-any-price party call the "recklessness" to take measures for providing the nucleus of an efficient Channel Fleet. It is impossible not to feel some satisfaction at seeing this duty fall to the lot of the very politicians who have been most forward in inducing the country to risk everything on the good faith and personal amity of Napoleon III.

Louis Napoleon might or might not, be the "Saviour of Society," the "Modern Augustus," the "Messiah of Order," the "Master spirit of the age." What was quite certain was that, for the purpose of his ambition, he was capable of violating, with every circumstance of deliberation and perfidy, the most solemn engagement that could be laid on the faith and honor of man. Such being the case, a prudent nation, however fond it might be of lions, would prefer not to put its head into this particular lion's mouth. The lion now seems to be wagging his tail, and the question is, whether he is going to bite our head off. It is exceedingly difficult, and indeed impossible to say—assertations to the contrary being, under the circumstances of the case, rather the reverse of reassuring. A Commonwealth may be an irritable and troublesome, but it can hardly be a treacherous neighbor. Its wrath against you gathers, not silently and secretly beneath the mask of cordial affection, but with all the outward and visible signs of effervescence and with loud premonitory clamor. You have always the fairest warning and the fairest opportunity of making up the difference if it is possible to do so, and, if not, of preparing for the conflict. Moreover, in a Commonwealth there is always a minority humane or factious enough to raise its voice on the side of peace. But a despot, wielding in his single hand the whole military power of a great nation, may, if he is of a close and astute turn of mind, waft you the kiss of peace in the morning, and launch upon you the havoc of war under the shades of the ensuing night. The mere change of the French Government from a constitutional Monarchy or a Republic to a military despotism—at which a certain party among us were so much delighted, independently of the character of the particular despot—produced an increase of danger to this country, entailing probably an additional expenditure of two or three millions a year. The best symptom in the present posture of affairs is the healthy eruption of hatred towards this country which is still allowed to break out in the wretched remnant of the old free press.

Louis Napoleon can be under no mistake as to the probable result to his own throne and that of his son, of a war in which England, fighting for existence, would place an energetic government at her head, and appeal to the revolutionary party throughout Europe. He and his Ministers, no doubt, are well aware that our army is now numerically weak, and that there is difficulty in finding volunteer seamen enough to man the fleet; but they must also be aware that a French invasion would convert every landsman into a soldier, and send every seaman on board of a man-of-war. The chance of a great army against a nation has been tried before now, between a less powerful nation than England and a better commanded army than that of Napoleon III.—not to mention the naval element of the calculation. It is highly improbable that the Emperor will play so desperate a card except in that extremity of domestic danger to which, so long as the army is true to him, he will not come. That the bulk of the army itself will demand war, whatever the Pretorian Guard may do, also seems improbable to those who know the real nature of the ordinary French conscript, sighing not for raids upon England, but for his paternal field. Even if the Emperor should come to his last card, it is by no means clear—especially since he has begun to coquet with Italian Liberalism—that he would not seek in Austria easier and more accessible triumphs for the Grand Army than are offered by the rough and rocky shores of Britain. Wherever he turns, he will find it a different game from what it was when the fiery columns of the Revolution, led by Bonaparte and Moreau, scattered the decayed armies and decrepit generals of the old monarchies of Europe. We will say nothing of the unspeakable wickedness of a man who should ravage the fairest garden of modern civilization for the selfish purpose of strengthening his own usurped throne. It is not every heart that is touched by such considerations; and policy requires us to be prepared as if we had to deal with an ambition utterly uncontrolled by regard for humanity or by the fear of Heaven.—London Saturday Review.

Peterboro' and Port Hope.

From the Port Hope Guide.

Yesterday the Railway Board, Town Council, and Harbor Commissioners, in their representative capacity, went over the line from Port Hope to Peterboro', for the purpose of inspecting it preliminary to the grand opening on Monday. They did so on the invitation of Mr. Fowler, the contractor. That gentlemen included the families of the Board and Town Council in the invitation, and the result of this gallantry on his part was the presence of some thirty or forty ladies on the excursion. The train left the station at Port Hope about half past seven o'clock and reached Millbrook in little less than an hour. It was arranged that the Mayor and Town Council of Peterboro' should meet the party at that place and accompany them to their destination. After waiting half an hour they made their appearance, and the Train getting under way was soon speeding over the Millbrook branch. At the approach to the station at Millbrook and at Cavan Creek Boundary there are curves, but the remainder of the Branch is as straight as an arrow. At one point the view ahead is unobstructed for six or seven miles.

It must be confessed that the Branch is, all things considered, in very good condition. It is as yet, unballasted, nevertheless, the cars run as steadily as on many a road that has been long operated. There are no deep cuttings, no high embankments, or long bridges on the Branch, and when it is opened for traffic better time will be made on it, with greater safety and less expense, than on any other portion of the line.

The citizens of Peterboro' assembled at the station welcomed their Port Hope visitors with much warmth. Carriages were in attendance to convey the ladies to Cassie's Hotel, at which place it was arranged the party should be provided with a lunch at eleven o'clock.

Peterboro' is indeed a handsome place, and as Mr. Harvey said, in his after dinner speech, "has the makings of a large city." The Otonabee River, rolling turbulently along, not only adds beauty and interest to the scenery in the neighborhood of the Town, but is a source of wealth, even as yet imperfectly known or understood.

Chaperoned by Mr. Conger and His Worship the Mayor of Port Hope, who is familiar with every foot of land in that section of country, the writer visited the principal objects of interest in Peterboro'. The improvements going on were pointed out, and we must say that the Town exhibits very marked evidences of progress. A new Presbyterian Church is in course of erection, to be completed at a cost of $16,000. It will seat about 1,500 persons. The inhabitants of Peterboro' appear to be alive to the importance of educational matters. They are erecting a spacious Union School Building, the cost of which will be $16,000. It is a two story edifice, but being erected on a hill side will show an imposing western front of three stories. The grounds are ample, and when fitted up as they propose fitting them up, will be a delightful place of recreation for the scholars attending the school.

Timber is now coming down the Otonabee in considerable quantities, and, about pay time in the day rafts may be seen passing down the dams across the River. Yesterday the excursionists had an opportunity of witnessing the sight, and to many it was a novel one.

His Worship the Mayor of Peterboro' [illegible] the chair, and did the honors on the occasion. After the cloth was removed [illegible] were given and responded to. Among others were, "The Municipal Council of Port Hope;" which was well responded to by His Worship the Mayor. "The President and Directors of the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railway," by Mr. Harvey; responded to by Mr. James Smith in a brief speech, in the course of which he dwelt upon the importance of extending our Railway to [illegible] Bay. [illegible] Smith having resumed his seat, Mr. Conger was called upon for some information about the extension to Georgian Bay. He spoke for about twenty minutes with correctness, & even eloquence. He glowingly described the great West, part of the trade of which would be secured by pushing our Railway through to the waters of Lake Huron, and dwelt upon the importance of opening up the country lying to the North and North West of Peterboro', which, he said was an "appendage" of being made a rich region, had as many of the elements of greatness in their soil as that which they now lived, and which had within comparatively a few years been reclaimed from the wilderness. "The health of Mr. David Smart, one of the first originators of the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railway," by Mr. Harvey, was suitably acknowledged by Mr. Smart. "The Press," by His Worship the Mayor of Port Hope, [illegible] ably responded to by Mr. Sawers, of the Peterboro' Examiner. Mr. Heathorn gave "Mr. Clarke, the first Engineer on the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railway, and Mr. Ridout, the present Engineer." Mr. Ridout and Mr. Clarke returned thanks. Some other toasts were given, when the time for departure having arrived, the party vacated the dining Hall.

The Peterboro Rifle Company and Brass Band, and hundreds of the inhabitants of Peterboro', escorted the excursionists to the station. A few minutes after four o'clock, the "all aboard" of the Conductor was heard, and amid a volley from the Rifle Company, music from the Band, and hearty cheers from the cr

THURSDAY, MAY 27, 1858.

The Queen's Birthday in Peterborough.

This day of rejoicing to all loyal British hearts was celebrated as usual by a regatta, made, &c. The Rifle company, with the Peterborough brass band, had accepted an invitation from Cobourg, to assist in the Grand Military Display, in which other neighbouring corps took part, consequently there was no parade of the martial arm at home; but the absence of the band was very generously supplied by the sister band of Peterborough East, who made themselves most agreeable visitors by their untiring exertions through the day, eliciting from the crowds which collected round them, the loud praises of the musical, on account of their rapid attainment of the use of their instruments, and of the people generally, for the very handsome manner in which they strove to give eclat to the proceedings which were going forward. A cricket match was announced, but from delays arising in other sections of the day's proceedings, the players gave way, and put off their part of the recreation to another time. The regatta came off on the Little Lake, and furnished a good deal of amusement to the lovers of aquatic sport. A voluntary was offered by a couple of gentlemen whose ardor becoming superior to the containing power of their canoe, expressed their disgust for such a condition of things, by withdrawing themselves from their confinement, and spreading themselves on the surface of the blue waters of the Little Lake, they returned amid the acclamations of the bystanders to the shore of their departure. It had been advertised that the railway communication between Port Hope and Peterborough would be thrown open to the public, in celebration of the Queen's Birthday, and that in order that no impediment should remain to limit the numbers who might desire to take advantage of it, no fare would be charged out, or on return. The people of Peterborough and surrounding country, eager for the pleasure of witnessing the entry of the mass which they expected to see conveyed to them, turned out in an immense throng, at the appointed hour for the arrival, but for some time were disappointed, owing, as it appeared, to a want of preparation for the vast numbers who presented themselves for embarkation, at Port Hope, and the way stations, the gentlemen having charge of the arrangements, never dreaming of such a rush as was made for the coveted places. However, notwithstanding that somewhere about one thousand persons were doomed to disappointment, at Port Hope alone, a train arrived, having on board, it was computed, some two thousand passengers, who were welcomed by what appeared to be the whole of the population of the town, and about one half of that of the county. By an oversight, certainly, not with any intention of slight, there was no formal reception on the part of the authorities of the town, an omission which would be much felt, inasmuch as the persons who were strangers, not being officially recognized, could not relieve themselves, without such an exercise of courtesy towards them, of the doubt some might entertain of the agreeableness of their visit to the parties it was intended for. This mistake cannot now be corrected for the past [illegible] for the benefit of all interested, that formalities and ceremonies of public bodies are not wanted, even upon the most vulgar, but by elevating the sentiment of the partakers therein, dispose the mind to cultivate the dignity of [illegible] in the strangers towards. After remarking the [illegible] of the afternoon, the party retired to their places on the cars, in good humor, and apparently satisfied with the [illegible]. The [illegible] not however pass in by a very [illegible] usual intelligent crowds in the vicinity [illegible] and the residents, a result [illegible] of the postponed engagement of the two [illegible] from want of a means of [illegible] communicating; there every one on the ground, however, felt very much [illegible] particular attention to the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] of their accommodation, especially to their telegraphic passengers, who are most accessible to over [illegible] the public. Mr. Shaw, who, with a large vessel of whiff might have been ice-cold lemonade in each hand, was kept constantly receiving and distributing with the other, a nice little mug, to outstretched hands from the windows. Mr. Shaw was evidently ahead of the time with his fellow townsmen. He understood the gratification that is contained in the application of refreshment to exhausted nature, and acted upon it; it were more to the credit of the town and the nation, at any rate, been more general. Peterborough has yet to learn, seemingly, what other communities practice on such occasions, or there would have been some public provision made for the reception of strangers, who are now so connected with us, as to make it of the first importance that a kindly and united feeling should exist between them. The brass band of Port Hope, under the guidance of Mr. Chisnapka, added materially to the enlivenment of the day, and altogether it was the most agreeable that has ever fallen upon the town of Peterborough. The road was pronounced by all to be of the most substantial description, and on Monday next, the same opportunity is to be afforded by Mr. Fowler to the people of Peterborough, of returning the visit to Port Hope. This excursion, like the last, will be free to all comers, and the more that avail themselves of it, the more he will be pleased. Those who partake of the promised enjoyment may look forward to a succession of the pleasure of the first excursion and all should go, it will do them good, and express more strongly than words the deep interest the people of Peterborough take in the work which unites their fortune in a measure with that of the people of Port Hope.

It now only remains to record the closing scene in the events of the day. This was contained in an elegant and recherche supper, held at the large warehouse in Peterborough East, which had been festooned, and in every respect made worthy of the purpose it was applied to. The supper was given in honor of the Otonabee Brass Band, who proved themselves so efficient in bringing enjoyment to the neighborhood, and who, as has been seen, can make their influence felt across the water in times of distress. The chair was taken by R. D. Rogers, Esq., and among the company were several visitors: A. Fowlis, Esq., Chas. Dunlop, Esq., Chas. Stewart, Esq., and many others. The rest of the company was composed of the most respectable among the inhabitants of Peterborough East. After the table was cleared, loyal toasts, sentiments, and music, kept the attention in constant play. The Band, who took up their position at the end of the hall, where a stand was erected, continued to play till a late hour, the intervals being occupied by some excellent vocal performers. The harmony of the evening remained unbroken to the last, and the company separated with but one feeling, that by the well directed efforts of the stewards another happy period had been added to their pleasures.

Melancholy Accident.

Our readers will be shocked to learn that on Monday, the Queen's Birthday, Miss Margaret Short, niece of Thomas Short, Esq., M. P. P., was drowned at Healy's Falls. Miss Short formed one of an excursion party on the steamer Otonabee, making a trip from Keene to Healy's. While walking down one side of the slide, made for the passage of timber, it is supposed she got dizzy, and the pass being narrow, she fell. A young man, by the name of John Lunderville, who was standing at the end of the slide, about 15 feet from her, at the time, jumped in immediately upon seeing her situation, and floated with the current in the same direction for some distance, but though he at times got quite close to her, he did not succeed in getting hold of her, and had he not received assistance from Mr. John L. Read, who had the presence of mind to run down to a point below him and reached him a pole, he also would have been drowned. A party of lumbermen, when they heard of the disaster, manned the small boat belonging to the Otonabee, and ran the slide, but before they got down to where she was last seen, she had disappeared. A young gentleman who was standing next to Lunderville, speaks in such high terms of his gallantry, that we have the greatest pleasure in giving it all the publicity in our power. Considering the danger to himself that was inseparable from the act, and the suddenness of his determination, it is abundantly evident that his heart beats with the strongest impulse towards relieving the distress of his fellow creatures. He is one of the heroic stamp, who take the world by surprise, when the occasion offers for the exhibition of disinterested gallantry, while they are content to be numbered with the undistinguished.

The Free Excursion.

There is a general feeling, among those who are in the service of employers in the Town, to have a holiday on Monday next, to enable them to spend the day in Port Hope, on the occasion of a free excursion, offered by the liberality of Mr. Fowler to the inhabitants of Peterboro'. We see every reason why this request should be complied with, the necessities of trade being unfortunately not very pressing, while the pleasure of [illegible] will add a new zest to their labour. The value of the occasion too is itself one that every inhabitant of Peterboro' will rejoice in the opportunity of acknowledging. We hope to see the Mayor's proclamation inviting a general observance of the Holiday, it will be a further proof to the people of Port Hope of our union in the matter of railways.

Queen Victoria is said to be [illegible] a trip to Canada this summer. The London Times says—"Perhaps like her loving Queen Victoria may extend her excursion [illegible] this year, and pay a visit to more remote portions of her dominions than she has yet honoured with her august presence."

The official Gazette contains a notification from Lord Stanley, the colonial secretary of England, stating that "directions have been given by the secretary of State for the Home Department, for the University of Toronto to be named among the affiliated institutions in the new charter now in preparation for the University of London." The despatch is dated 31st March.

THE BESIEGERS IN THE CITY.

OPENING OF THE BREACH.

We had, he says, attacked the Imaumbarrah or Imambarra with such vigor that the enemy, dismayed by the stern onslaught, by the fire of our artillery, and by the lesson they had received at the storm of the Begum's Palace, abandoned their position, and flying in disorder into the Kaiserbagh, so entirely disheartened the garrison, already decimated by the bombardment, that they gave up the key of their position almost without a struggle. The news took every one by surprise. When Brigadier Napier, who all along expressed his opinion that the Begum's Palace was the key of the enemy's works, sent up word soon after eleven o'clock that we were in the works of the Kaiserbagh, a feeling of little less than astonishment pervaded the whole of the Staff. It was, indeed, a most unexpected result to find that we had obtained, with little loss, the citadel which the enemy had fortified with so much labor, and which they declared they would defend to the last. Every one was on the spot as speedily as possible. The air was still heavy with gunpowder; bullets were whistling around from the desperate men shut up in the works, and from the enemy in the inner line of defences. Our men were just crashing through the rooms of the palaces, which were as yet filled with the evidence of barbaric magnificence and splendor, and the cries of the dying were not yet stilled when we entered.

A PALACE IN RUINS.

The Kaiserbagh cannot be described. The place is a series of palaces, kiosks, and mosques, all of fanciful Oriental architecture—some light and graceful, others merely fantastic and curious, connected generally by long corridors arched and open in the front, or by extensive wings, which close the courts and gardens contained within the outer walls. In every room throughout the endless series there was a profusion of mirrors in ponderous gilt frames. A universal gilding of cornices, furniture, and everything that would bear the process seemed the prevailing taste in the Royal Court. From every ceiling hung glass chandeliers of every age, form, color, and design. As to the furniture, in many instances it looked like collections from the lumber-rooms of all the old palaces of Europe—Louis Quatorze clocks and worked ebony chests, marqueterie tables, solid lumpy old German state chairs, gilt all over; but these were relieved by the richest carpets, by sumptuous divans, by cushions covered with golden embroidery, by rich screens of Cashmere shawls, and by table-covers ponderous with pearls and gold. In some of the rooms there were a few good pictures, said to be by Sir Joshua Reynolds, Lawrence Zoffany, and Beechey, but I did not see any traces of Sir Joshua on the walls when I entered, and there was only one picture which looked at all like a Lawrence. There were numerous portraits of the present and former kings of Oude, and oil copies of the portraits of Governors-General, of Wellington, Nelson, George IV., and Bonaparte, many Chinese drawings, French crayons, and English engravings of all sorts, even those from Williamson's Wild Sports of the East, an old and almost forgotten book on tiger hunting, in gorgeous frames, but the hand of the spoiler was heavy among them all. Those hung out of the range of the musket stock and bayonet were scarcely safe from a bullet or the leg of a table. Down came chandeliers in a tinkling, clattering rain of glass—crash! crash! crash! door and window, and mirror and pendule! Sikh and soldier were revelling in destruction and delirious with plunder and mischief. Those who could not get in at once to carry on the work searched the corridors, battered off the noses, legs, and arms of the statues in the gardens, or, diving into cellars, either made their fortunes by the discovery of unsuspected treasure, or lost their lives at the hands of concealed fanatics. There was no time to guard against indiscriminate plunder, inasmuch as it never was expected that the Kaiserbagh and all its treasures would have fallen into our hands. It was stormed at once, but it could hardly be said that any great resistance was offered by the enemy. As they fled from the Imaumbarrah, with Brasier's Sikhs and the 10th Regiment in fast pursuit, they rushed in such confusion through the detached houses and courts between it and the Kaiserbagh that a universal panic was created, and the Sikhs entered by the rear, and gateways along with the enemy. They were supported by men of the corps engaged in the assault of the Imaumbarrah. At the very aspect of these men inside the defences, the Sepoys and Nujeebs lost heart, and fled out of the courts and buildings. Some were shot up, or secreted themselves in recesses, and in many mysterious apartments of an eastern palace. All who remained in arms were shot or bayoneted on the spot. The Kaiserbagh was ours before twelve o'clock.

A PHOTOGRAPH OF LUCKNOW.

Nothing but a photograph can give a notion of Lucknow as it is seen from the minaret or roof of the Imaumbarrah—such a sea of roofs, amid green groves and gardens, surmounted by gilt domes and slender minarets, and all the strange combinations of lines and ornaments in which Oriental architects delight. The large room of the Imaumbarrah, which seems to have been used as a sort of museum, and contained many curious models of mosques, and many glass glasses and chandeliers, was a heap of ruins, and every building bore marks of our shot and shell. Working our way through Sikhs busy in melting down gold and silver lace in large fires under earthen pots which served as crucibles, through wounded Ghoorkas staggering back to the rear, we approached the Kaiserbagh by the strada along which Havelock's rear guard marched towards the Residency. Every window of every house was filled with brick or baked mud, and loop-holed, and the tops of all the houses and walls had a raised parapet, pierced in the same way, above them. The heat and the dust were very fatiguing and oppressive, but the excitement carried one forward, and at last we managed to get through the breach in the parapet of the outer work, which our Sappers were rapidly enlarging for the passage of our guns, and to enter one of the courts of the Kaiserbagh through a small gateway or broken door. It was surrounded with rooms with latticed windows, to which access was gained by means of stairs opening into the court, the strong doors of which were burned on the inside. The walls were characterized in different fresco representations of arms and fruits painted. On one side the tiers of a portion could be caught sight of through the Venetian blinds, and there was evidence that we were close to the King's Kenana and that the buildings about us were the houses of his eunuchs. The Imaumbarrah had been breached in a very extraordinary manner. Two 68-pounders (Naval Brigade guns) were brought up into a courtyard close to the entrenchments and fired through the wall in front of them, which was invisible to the gunners. The latter were of course protected from the enemy's musketry by the brick walls, through which the cannon shot made only a clear round shot the size of itself. A very short time sufficed to batter the parapet and outer walls of the Imaumbarrah into a heap of ruins on the place where we sought to enter, and it was thus the Begum's Palace was breached also. As one struggled over the masses of fallen brickwork, the traces of our sap, chocked up here and there with fallen earth, were close on our left, till the sap reached a long corridor by the side of a court which served as an excellent covered way for our Sappers. The enemy's cooking places, brass pots or lotas, charpoys, clothing, belts, ammunition, broken muskets and matchlocks, swords, pistols, chupatties, or cakes of unleavened bread, were scattered all over the ground on every side; but there were not many dead visible till we reached some of the courts of the Imaumbarrah.

UNTIMELY AMUSEMENT AND NARROW ESCAPE.

Our men were in high delight with the gay dresses of the eunuchs which they found in some of the rooms, and it was with difficulty they were induced to take off the crowns of lace and peacock's plumes, and bird of paradise feathers, and the swordbelts they stuck over their heads and shoulders. Here, as in every other building, there were quantities of kites, the flying of which seems a favourite amusement of these childish but ferocious races. Goats, horses, the stately Cyrus cranes, tame monkeys, apes, antelopes, numbers of parroquets, in cages, were also appropriated by the men. But it was scarcely a place for zoological investigation. Lieutenant Colonel Johnston, of Wilson's Staff; his brother, Captain Johnston, the Deputy-Quartermaster-General, head-quarters camp; Lord Seymour, Lieutenant Stewart, Bengal Engineers, and myself were looking at one of our men who decked himself out in fantastic eunuchs attire, when a shot, evidently from one of the rooms of the court, passed between us, and, as they had been fired at before from the same, they moved off to another spot. Very soon afterwards a man of the 90th was shot through the body, and Lieutenant-Colonel Kelly, to whom I had been speaking a moment before, was struck by a spent ball on the head. I moved off out of such an unpleasant neighbourhood, but as I passed out of the court the rascal, who appeared to be secreted in one of the upper rooms, sent a bullet within an inch of my cap and precipitated my retreat. In this seige there is no such pleasant vantage ground as Cathcart's hill or a well protected parallel, from which one can get a view of what is going on without any risk except that from a long-range shot or stray shell, and more officers have been killed and wounded here after our actions are over by the enemy hidden in unknown holes and corners than in the actual service of the field.

RICH PLUNDER—GOLD AND JEWELS.

In the next court, which was sheltered from fire by the walls around it, our men had made a great seizure of rich plunder. They had burst into some of the state apartments, and they were engaged in dividing the spoil of shawls and lace, and embroidery of gold and silver, and pearls. In a nook of this court, where there was a little shade, we retired to rest ourselves, as there was no means of approaching the front, part of the buildings being on fire, and explosions of mines feared every moment. Two men of the 90th were in before us, and, assisted later by some of the 38th, we saw them appropriate money's worth enough to make them independent for life. The rooms of this nook had been used as stores by the King or some wealthy member of his household, and each moment these men went in only to emerge with a rich trophy. In one box they found diamond bracelets, emeralds, rubies, pearls, and opals, all so large, so bright, and badly set, that we believed at the time they were glass. In another was a pair of gold-mounted and jewelled duelling pistols, of English make, and the bill, stating that His Majesty the King of Oude owed the maker £280; then out they came with bundles of swords, gold-mounted and jewelled, which they at once knocked to pieces for the sake of the mountings, leaving the blades behind them. Next came out a huge chemical laboratory, then a gold saddlecloth, studded with pearls; then gold-handled riding canes then cups of agate and jade, gold-mounted and jewelled; then—but I must really stop this broker's inventory. The happy possessors of these riches were quite mad with excitement. "Is this gold sir?" "Is that a diamond?" "Is your honour shure that's raal goold?" "Is this string of little white stones (pearls) worth anything, gintlemen?" It was a great drawback to have a conscience under such circumstances—a greater to have a penny in one's pockets, for in this country no one except an old stager on the lookout for loot carries a farthing about him, and, as one of the soldiers observed, "These here concerns only carries on ready money transactions!" He was an experienced operator, that gentleman. If a native soldier came in and walked off with anything which he found in a dark corner, out pounced my friend upon him, rifle in hand, "Leave that there I tell you. I put that there myself!" and there was something in his eye which explained his meaning so clearly that the article was at once abandoned, and if found to be valuable was retained; if not, was "made a present of." Close to us were large boxes of japanned work containing literally thousands of cups and vessels of crystal, and of china, which the soldiers were listlessly throwing on the ground and breaking into atoms.—Had the enemy made a strong attack on us at this moment, not one-half of our troops could have collected to repel it. And such were the scenes through every court of the many mansions of the Kaiserbagh.

BREAKING INTO THE ZENANA—ORIENTAL CUNNING.

Meantime intelligence reached the Chief of the Staff that the women of the Zenana were secreted in one of the strongest parts of the Kaiserbagh. Some engineer officers whose names I do not know; Captain Hope Johnstone, of General Mansfield's staff; and Lieutenant Colonel Johnson, R. A., with two companies of the 38th, immediately proceeded to that spot, into which some of our soldiers had already forced an entrance. In doing so the pen of one of the Begums, a deaf and dumb youth of 20 years of age, and two or three of the ladies of the Zenana were unfortunately killed by a discharge of musketry when the doors were burst in, before the soldiers saw that they were women. It may be imagined what a state of terror the Begums and their attendants were in when our men entered. They expected death every instant, and when [illegible] first were intercepted by the knowledge of the fact that Jemadar Ishmael Khan were shot up in a room close at hand, and was shot might seal their fate. Huddled together amid the smoke, they could scarcely be calmed by the assurances of the officers, who at once took measures to remove them to a place of safety. As they were going out one of the ladies pointed out to Captain Hope Johnstone a box which he had just taken from the floor and laid upon the table. She told him it contained jewels to the value of 10 lacs of rupees, or £100,000.—He at once placed sentries at the doors, and gave orders that no one should enter. Having with the aid of his brother officers, taken the ladies out of danger, he retired to the Zenana. It was blazing from end to end. The sentries only escaped by clambering up to the roof, from which they were with difficulty saved. The jewels were gone. Had Captain Johnstone taken them they would have been his, for the Kaiserbagh on this day was given up to plunder, and what each man could get became his property.

VANISHING SPLENDOUR.

Those stately buildings, which had never before been entered by European foot except by a Commissioner of Oude on a state day, were now open to the common soldier and to the poorest camp follower of our army. How their splendours vanished like snow in sunshine! The destruction around one, the yells of the Sikhs and natives were oppressive. I was glad to get away just as our mortars began to thunder away at the enemy's works again. There were burning stoolades, and thousands of pounds of powder near at hand. In every court there was abundance of all kinds of ammunition, except six-pounder shot, which, as well as many nine-pounder balls, were rudely made of hammered iron. In one court we found a large brass mortar, with heaps of live brass and stone shells near it, but I could not find any fuses, as the enemy seldom used shell, notwithstanding that I saw a good many of our own in the Kaiserbagh; I presume they did not know how to manufacture the fusee composition. It was on the evening when we returned to camp, through roads thronged with at least 20,000 camp followers, all staggering under loads of plunder—the most extraordinary and indescribable spectacle I ever beheld—coolies, syces, kitmatgars, dhooly-bearers, Sikhs, grass-cutters, a flood of men covered with clothing not their own, carrying on heads and shoulders looking-glasses, mirrors, pictures, brass pots, swords, firelocks, rich shawls, scarfs, embroidered dresses, all the "loot" of ransacked palaces. The noise, the dust, the shouting, the excitement were almost beyond endurance. Lucknow was borne away piecemeal to camp, and the wild Ghoorkas and Sikhs, with open mouths and glaring eyes, burning with haste to get rich, were contending fiercely against the current, as they sought to get to the sources of such unexpected wealth.

AN APPEAL FROM THE BEGUM.

A heavy bombardment and fire were maintained on the portions of the city near the stone bridge, which may have had the effect of inducing the Begum to write an appeal to Sir James Outram, which he answered by calling on her to come in and surrender herself to the Government, at the same time that he took steps, to enable her to do so if she pleased. General Outram, who had shifted his quarters to this side of the river, to Bank's bungalow, gave the Begum some time to determine what course she would take, and he actually suspended our attack on the stone bridge, lest it might interfere with her movements, but as the morning advanced it was evident that her Majesty either would not or could not trust herself to our hands.

FIGHTING AMONG THE RUINS OF THE RESIDENCY.

The moment for action came, and the troops pressed on, but it was found that the enemy had abandoned the greatest part of the buildings which they were expected to be in, and that they had retreated to the houses beyond the ruins of the Residency, close to the south side of the iron bridge, which they appeared resolute to defend, the houses and the palaces between the iron and the stone bridges being occupied by them in force. The day was exceedingly hot, and I scarcely expected to see men go through their work so well; but the excitement carried them on, and the blue-coated Bengal Fusiliers and the red-coated Highlanders seemed as little fatigued as the 23rd in their light mud-coloured tunics.—The bheesties moving lightly about with their skins of water no doubt helped to sustain them. As we advanced with the 23rd it was interesting to be told that our route lay through the very same buildings by which Sir Colin led out the garrison of Lucknow. Our march went past and through a line of palaces,—the Lalbagh, the Furra Bux, Chutter Munsil, till we came out upon a large space with pierced gateways, one shattered turret, and some tottering walls rising amid heaps of rubbish, and surrounded by traces of a trench. This gateway was the old Bailey Guard; inside that broken window Lawrence met his death. Here was ground made holy by patient courage and by the noblest endurance and patience all around us. We stood amid the ruins of the Residency and of the works defended by the garrison of Lucknow. The 23rd entered first and were followed by the 79th; the Bengal Fusiliers were in support and as we passed through the Chutter Munsil we found the 20th in reserve in case they were needed. Col. Wells, of the 23rd, received his orders from Sir James Outram and Mr. Cavanagh whose name is so famous in connection with the Lucknow seige, volunteered to show the advanced party the way to the iron bridge, and rode at their head as they advanced at the double. One party went to the left, the other to the right down by the road. The moment our men appeared over the ruins of the Residency the enemy opened on them, and their bullets came "pinging" overhead. Two of the 79th and several dhooly-bearers were hit close at hand as they were drawn up in front. On the road was a small entrenchment, with an embrasure for a 9-pounder. As our men got within 200 yards, this gun, deliberately laid, was fired. "Whish" went the grape with a murmur like a flight of birds. Two, and only two of the men fell, and in a moment more the gun is ours! Our guns from the north are turned against the stone bridge, across which the enemy are flying in thousands—horse, foot, guns and baggage, men, women and children. Outram's guns open from the front of the Residency on the large Imaumbarrah, and in a few minutes we hear that the stone bridge is to be assaulted also. The men rest for awhile, getting, by the General's orders, as much into the shade as possible. Then orders come for the Bengal Fusiliers and the 79th to advance. We pass the Machee Bawun, a fine building, blown up by Lawrence to clear the ground for his guns. There are dead Sepoys on the road—not many—and ruined houses. Our guns on the iron bridge are pounding away at the fugitives who are running up and down on the stone bridge, for they have Grant in rear of them, and they do not know what to do. We enter a broad street with magnificent arched gateways. Then down to the left through one of these, and there stands the great European dwelling-house I have yet seen in India, with the grounds, park, [illegible] and flights of steps, broad esplanades, and gardens once rich with fountains. The 79th are soon installed in the great saloon, said to be one of the largest arched stone roofs in the east or west. I paced it, and could only make out that it was 63 yards by 21. There was a throne covered with silver, and silver sconces and many candelabras inside, but I was glad to get out of the dust and heat, and climb by a winding stair to the gallery outside the high and slender minaret of the mosque, from which there was a beautiful view of the city. To-day's proceedings were most successful. The whole of the city along the river's bank is ours, up to the stone bridge, and there is no longer any escape for the enemy by the bridges. Those who have been cut off or have fled from the interior of the city are collecting at the Moosabagh. All these operations have been so judiciously effected that our losses have been most trifling. Up to this date (March 16th) we have taken upwards of 80 guns, and killed at least 8,000 of the enemy. The loosters report that every house contains a dead man. As if to maintain their reputation for eccentric and uncertain conduct in war, the Sepoys came out to-day in great force in front of the Alumbagh, and are reported to have shown more cavalry and guns than on any former occasion. They did nothing, however, and returned into the city, when they found the little garrison, under Franklyn, was ready for their reception.

RESCUE OF MISS JACKSON AND MISS ORR.

Mr. Russell gives the following account of the way in which these ladies were rescued:—As Captain M'Neil, of the Bengal Artillery, attached to the Ghoorkas, and Lieut. Bogle, of the same force, were exploring the deserted streets in front of the Ghoorka advanced posts they encountered a native, who said he was one of Sir J. Outram's employes, and implored their protection for his house and property. In the course of his appeal he mentioned incidentally that he knew where the English ladies were confined, and offered to point out the place. Almost immediately afterwards another native appeared and presented two notes—one from Miss Orr, the other from Miss Jackson, imploring immediate succour as their enemies were making search for them. The officers returned to the nearest Ghoorka post, and called for volunteers; 40 or 50 of these hardy, dirty, and [illegible] loving Calmucks stepped forth, and with a native at their head as a guide, the party at a rapid rate started off on their errand of deliverance. They proceeded far more than half a mile through the silent tortuous streets, expecting to receive a volley at every turn, when they came to a house apparently shut and abandoned. "This is the house," said the guide. At the noise of their footsteps the owner—Meer Wajeed Ali, Daroga of the Court—made his appearance, and began to stipulate for his property, but Capt. M'Neil demanded the immediate production of the ladies, and finding he was resolute the Daroga led him to an obscure apartment, where were two ladies in Oriental costume in a dark corner. At the sound of the voice,—"Are you the English ladies, and do you wish to leave this place?" those whom he addressed were not able to reply to the officer from excessive joy, and for a moment or two they were overwhelmed with thankfulness and emotion. But there was no time to be lost. The Moolvie and his followers were known to be searching for them. The ladies, clad as they were, descended to the street, and were about to be placed on the officers' horses, when a palanquin caught the eye of Capt. M'Neil in the Court of the house.—Just as the ladies were getting into it a few budmashes, with drawn swords, rallied out from an adjoining house to attack them, but a shot from a revolver and the bayonets of the Guoorkas soon disposed of their resistance, and six of the Daroga's retainers being impressed as palanquin bearers, the party and a portion of the escort moved back as rapidly as possible to the Ghoorka post, and the poor ladies were placed in safety. At the same time some other Christians, Eurasians, and descendants of Europeans, were saved by the guard of Lieutenant Bogle, and were delivered out of the hands of their enemies. It is but just to say, however, that although the native Christian community was so large as to form a gunj or quarter of its own, consisting perhaps 500 persons, there is no reason to believe that the Sepoys persecuted or murdered them. Most of them, fearing ill-treatment, concealed themselves.

A REMARKABLE CIRCUMSTANCE.

Strange are the events of war and the incidents on which they turn! I have often thought how different had been the course of action on the part of commanders if they knew the counsels of their adversaries and their plans of action. It is now stated on excellent authority that when Sir Colin Campbell was marching away after his famous relief of the garrison of Lucknow, his enemies, so far from thinking of an attack upon us, were almost ready to surrender at discretion. It must be remembered that the works which now astonish us did not then exist, and that the advance of a force which had inflicted on the Sepoys the tremendous punishment of Secunderbagh, and had marched to the Residency, occupying most commanding positions, could not fail to alarm the enemy. Tim Begum, in terror proposed to send in to the Commander-in Chief for terms, and to hoist a white flag on the Kaiserbagh; but the chief and Sepoy soubahdars met in council, and determined to wait for 24 hours before they resolved on any course of the kind, and during those 24 hours our Commander-in-Chief, little thinking by what feelings the enemy were agitated, was making his dispositions for the masterly retreat which brought him just in time to Cawnpore. The enemy could scarcely credit their senses when they found the Residency and its defences empty and for some time they were in dread that we had prepared some trap for them to fall into; but when assured of our retreat their rapourings and exultation became unbounded, and [illegible] of the [illegible] given by Outram's presence in the Alumbagh, they declared that the British would never again show their faces in Lucknow.

THE STORY OF JESSIE BROWN.

I regret to be obliged to destroy the foundation for such pretty poetry and pretty pictures as the story of Jessie, the Highland lassie, and the bagpipes of the Highlanders has afforded us hope; but on enquiry, I find that there were no bagpipes played within many miles of Lucknow, and that the voices of sleight and pibroch were silent; not a warlike speech announced that "the Campbells were coming," but, more or less, then all, there was no lassie at all in the garrison who by any possibility could have been the heroine of private theatres of the drama, and every one knew long before the loudest shout of all the happiness in Scotland could have proclaimed it that Havelock was coming to the assistance of the garrison. The Alumbagh is at least 7 miles from the Residency.

For the Examiner.

The Anniversary of the Queen's Birth Day in Smith.

Monday being the Anniversary of the Birth Day of Her Most Gracious Majesty, many were the modes resorted to by Her subjects in this part of Her dominions, to manifest their loyalty to their Sovereign in a becoming manner on that occasion, and among the many ways which were adopted for that purpose, none, I think were more commendable than the course pursued by the Band of Hope Division, No. 368 Sons of Temperance, they having a few weeks previous decided to honor that day, in a manner which would be alike creditable to themselves and the Township of Smith, they accordingly gave a general invitation to all the friends around, with the neighboring Temperance organizations, and several speakers to unite with them, and partake of the refreshments which they so plentifully provided; accordingly at 3 o'clock, about three hundred persons among whom were a good representation of the fair sex, sat down in their commodious Rustic Tent, to partake of a repast which was so abundantly supplied by the visiting members of the Division; and I am certain that from the mysterious manner in which the refreshments disappeared, was satisfactory evidence of how justly the good things were appreciated, but this source of enjoyment came to a close, and then came an intellectual feast with suitable speaking material; Mr. Ford, D. G. W. P. of Peterboro' Division, was called to the chair, and presided with great ability and general satisfaction; then came Rev. J. Gilmour, who is a veteran in the Temperance cause, who addressed the meeting in his own happy and pleasing style, during which his loyalty for Her Majesty was frequently manifested; next followed Rev. Wm. Scott, and as if determined not to be second to any in his loyalty, proposed three cheers for the Queen, which was given with a fervor that manifested its sincerity; then he proceeded armed with facts and arguments that could not be gainsayed, which he used with terrible effect against the votaries of Alcohol, leaving a theme for meditation which will take some to digest to their own satisfaction. Then came the Rev. Mr. Roberts, remarking upon the prosperity and progress of the Order of the Sons in Smith, and of the decided influence for good which they are exercising, and which is constantly extending in that community. Mr. Mission, of Smith Division, added to the interests of the proceedings by singing two original Temperance Songs which were received with great applause; the only source of regret which we experienced was not having an opportunity to judge of the ability of the native material of that Division on the platform, and the entire absence of music by the members of that body, a defect which the infancy of the organization must account for, however we had to part, but it was with feelings of mutual satisfaction with each other, and the Band of Hope Division in particular.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE AND LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

THE DIRECTORS of the Peterborough Mechanics Institute and Library Association respectfully invite the co-operation of the inhabitants of the Town and vicinity to the sustaining of a good READING ROOM and LIBRARY in their midst. The advantages of such must be so evident to every one, that they do not consider it necessary to urge them here. About 100 Papers and Periodicals from different parts of the Canadas and the United States are received weekly in the Reading Room; and it is intended, should sufficient encouragement be received, to procure in addition to them at an early day, some of the leading British Newspapers. The Library contains 600 volumes, to which additions are constantly being made. The terms of subscription have been placed very low so as to place the advantages within the reach of every person in the community. To subscribers the subscription is 5s 6d, to all others 10s; payable half yearly in advance. Subscriptions will be received, and any other information given on application to the Secretary at the Reading Room. Next the Telegraph Office, Sherbrooke's Block.

PLEASE READ.

THE GREAT WONDER OF THE AGE.—A NEW ERA DAWNING upon the USERS of PEN and INK. A valuable and wonderful discovery.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK.

An entirely new article, by the discovery of which Pen and Ink are rendered useless. It can be used as a

Writing, Copying, or Indelible Ink

For either of which it can truly be called the ne plus ultra of the kind. For

Writing

It possesses all the beauty of fluid Ink. It is jet black, and so permanent as not to be removed by the strongest oxalic acid. Hence its great value in writing deeds, wills, and other valuable papers. As it will not blot nor crack, it is highly commendable for the use of book-keepers and writers generally. For

Copying,

It works wonderfully. Three, or even four copies can be made at one writing, thus dispensing with the copying machines and the trouble attending it. By a process recently discovered embroidery patterns, pictures, etc, can be copied accurately on cloth, wood, steel, or any hard substance. For

Printing,

Postmasters and users of stamping apparatus generally value it highly. It matters not how careless the operation, a legible impression is invariably made. Its permanency makes it particularly valuable for stamping clothes.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK

Is put up in packages arranged especially for the travelling community. It can be carried in the pocket, and used at any time. There is no pen required for using it, but it contains in itself everything requisite for persons desiring to correspond with their friends. Every one will find this as represented. As many may be inclined to class the "Portable" as one of the many humbugs of the day, we agree to send a sample package to any one for twenty-five cents, or the same amount in postage stamps. Do you wish for Honourable, Genteel, and Lucrative Employment?

We wish to engage agents for the sale of this celebrated Ink, and can assure all that they will find no better employment or more money-making business than this, and hoping that you will carefully consider it, we await your orders.

TERMS.

To local or travelling agents, we offer the following inducements: For Two Dollars we will send any one two packages of the Ink by mail, and prepay postage on the same; and also we will send full and explicit directions for making, putting up and selling the article.

Any one can make and sell enough to remunerate him for his outlay in a single day.

Pay of the Business.

It is unnecessary to say anything of the money that can be made in this business. It is certainly now and in great demand. Any person can make and put up a thousand packages a day, which will cost three dollars, and which retail at twenty-five cents each, making a profit of two hundred and forty-seven dollars.

☞ No agent will be confined to a single county, but may sell wherever he chooses. You can realize from three to five dollars per day. We wish it understood, that no deviation from the above will be made. Orders solicited.—Address,

PATENT
ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatary and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or greased brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or lime used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THIS COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Wednesday, May 26th 1858.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

Hon. Mr. DEBLAQUIERE rose for the purpose of bringing under the notice of the House the petition of the Mayor, the clergy of various denominations, and including 761 inhabitants of the city of Kingston, praying for the abolition of labor on the Lord's day in the Post-Office, Canals, and Railways of this Province, as well as all other petitions to the same effect, presented to this House during the session, with a view to an Address to his Excellency the Governor General on the subject, or of such other measure as to this honorable House may seem meet. The hon. gentleman said that it would be in the recollection of the House, that last session, the Committee to whom were referred various petitions, twenty-seven in number, upon the subject of abolishing Sunday labor, reported on the 29th of April in favor of the passing of a Bill to secure that for which the petitioners prayed. The report produced its effect upon the House, and on the 28th of May, an Address founded upon it was adopted by the Council, and ordered to be presented to his Excellency. Before he could proceed further, it would be necessary for him to be informed by the President of the Council, whether any reply was made to, or any action taken upon, the Address of the House.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET—There was nothing done upon the Address, a motion of a similar character having been defeated by the other House.

Hon. Mr. DEBLAQUIERE was not surprised at that answer, as he did not at the time expect that the Address would be favorably attended to, from various circumstances, and also, he was sorry to say, from recollections of the manner in which this House had been frequently treated by the Government of the day. (Hear, hear.) Every attention seemed to be paid to the House of Assembly up to a very late period, but it had been the custom of Governments to set at naught most important questions affecting the public interest when brought forward by the Legislative Council, and not only that, but to act contrary to opinions which they might express. The answer which he had just received would enable him to shape his future course in regard to the subject now before the House. The proper and most respectful course taken on a subject of great national importance to pass an address to his Excellency. The course had been adopted—the House had seen with what result. It required no argument or reasoning on his part to induce the House to sustain the opinion they had deliberately and solemnly expressed—namely, that the commands of Almighty God should not be set at defiance in this Province. Up to the present time, this House, at all events, had done their duty. They had in a respectful manner, and backed by the public voice, placed representations at the foot of the Throne, but their prayer had not been attended to because an Address of a contrary nature had been presented by the other House. Now, he did not think that what was done in the other House with regard to this subject ought in any way to interfere with what had been done by this House.

Hon. Mr. MORRIS—The President of the Council said a similar motion had been defeated in the other House.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—This House does not make laws without the concurrence of the other House.

Hon. Mr. DEBLAQUIERE said the defeat of a motion in the other House did not justify the disregard by the Government of the course solemnly taken by this House, and he did not conceive that the House could now act in any other way than by giving their sanction to the Bill which, after receiving the reply that had been made by the President of the Council, he felt it his duty to bring in. It was entitled an Act for closing Canals, Post-offices, and all offices in the Public Departments on the Lord's Day, and to prohibit the running of trains on railways, and the departure of steamers and other vessels from port on that day. In support of the Bill he quoted from the Kingston petition several forcible arguments in its favor, and said that when they considered what was contained in the Sacred Book that lay before them on the table, and that they daily expressed a prayer to Almighty God that religion and piety might be preserved in the land, they must feel that all their prayers were a mockery so long as they permitted the express commands of the Almighty to be everywhere violated throughout the land. He concluded by moving the first reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON (the Chairman of the Committee appointed last year) said he had more pleasure than he could express in seconding the motion. This was one of the most important measures ever brought before Parliament, and it was alike advocated by Catholics and Protestants. The matter was one which would admit of no procrastination, and whatever excuses were urged regarding "expediency," the voice of the country would make itself heard, and not allow the subject to be staved off for another twelvemonth. The Receiver General would possibly say that the abolition of Sunday labor would interfere with the Grand Trunk Railway, of which he was President; but a question of convenience could have no weight with men accustomed to read their Bibles, and to ponder well the Divine command which was now so flagrantly violated. There was a time coming when those who despised and desecrated the Sabbath would bitterly repent the evil course which they had adopted.

Hon. Mr. ROSS would say for the Grand Trunk Railway Company that they were desirous of conforming to the laws of the land, and that they would rejoice very much if they could give their employees rest during the Sabbath day.

Hon. Mr. MORRIS said that a measure of this kind, if it were to be successful, ought to be initiated by the Government, inasmuch as it interfered with governmental departments, and he thought that the course pursued by hon. gentleman who had just introduced the Bill, ought not to have been taken until one more appeal had been made to the Governor General. He expressed himself surprised at the curt reply given to the hon. gentleman by the President of the Council. Was this House to be ignored and the members to be told that a respectful Address from them to his Excellency was undeserving of notice? He regretted for the credit of the House, that such a reply should have been given, and especially by a Member of the Government.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON explained, with regard to what had transpired last year, that so little satisfied was he with the reception given to the Address upon this subject, that he had resolved to bring in a Bill, and he would have done so had he not been requested to postpone it, as it was said that nothing could then be done. He assured the House that another twelve months would not be allowed to pass by unimproved.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET, adverting to the remarks of Hon. Mr. Morris, asked if his hon. friend expected his Excellency to send down a formal answer to the Address of this House, because it was the first time he had ever heard of any such mode of procedure. He had not said that the Government had taken no action on this subject; but no action had been taken on the Address simply because no action could be taken in the face of an Opposition vote in the other branch of the Legislature. With regard to the statement of his having made a curt reply, he had given no other than a short answer to a short question—had he made a long speech he supposed he would have been complimented for his courtesy. He thought there was no curtness in his reply.

Hon. Mr. MORRIS—You are mistaken.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET was, then, sorry for it. The motion he had referred to as having been proposed in the other House, was upon the question for reading a second time a Bill similar to that now before the House. The Government had, so far as they could, consistently with the public business, reduced the Sunday labour in the public departments, and the labour now performed in the public offices were merely nominal. With railways and steamboats the Government could not interfere, until a Bill was passed declaring Sunday labour illegal. If his hon. friend (Mr. Morris) asked why the Government did not introduce a Bill, he would reply by enquiring why his hon. friend did not introduce such a measure when he was Postmaster General. Perhaps his hon. friend was not a better Christian now than then. There was room for the improvement of all of them in virtue and morals—hear, hear—and he should be glad that his hon. friend was day by day improving in that direction.

Hon. Mr. MORRIS.—The question was scarcely agitated at the time you speak of.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET begged his hon. friend's pardon. The subject had been agitated for years and years, and like every other question it had grown by agitation. His hon. friend probably knew that different opinions were held regarding the proper mode of observing the Sabbath. The most learned divines said that a too strict observance of the Sabbath, instead of making it a Christian Sabbath, converted it into a Jewish Sabbath. Some people observed the Sabbath with a strictness almost astonishing, and others with a looseness which was also almost astonishing. He did not oppose the introduction of the Bill, the merits of which could be discussed when it came up for a second reading; but he had risen to say that the Government had been unable to act contrary to the opinion of the House of Assembly.

Hon. Col. PRINCE dissented from the view that a measure of this nature ought to be left to the Government. He was of opinion that when the Government refused to bring in a Bill calculated to do the great good which this measure would effect, it behoved the private members, as Christian legislators, as men living in a Christian country, desirous of giving good laws to their country, and willing to obey the commands of the Most High, to initiate such a measure. He would never subscribe to the doctrine that this House should be made subservient to the Government, and he would in this business support his hon. friend (Mr. De Blaquiere) from beginning to end. He was much surprised at what the President of the Council had said respecting eminent divines having differed upon the proper mode of keeping the Sabbath. No orthodox divines every differed upon the subject. Sceptics and Pussyites, or others who desired a little fleeting popularity, might differ—such divines as these did no honour to their calling. "Thou shalt keep holy the Sabbath day" were words written upon tables of stone, and it was the duty of every Christian to keep it holy.—(Hear, hear.) His correspondence was perhaps as large as that of any four other gentlemen in either House; but he never felt any inconvenience from not receiving his letters on Sunday, and he never yet heard of injury in any shape or form being done to the public by abstaining from labour on the Sabbath. The vast numbers of employees now engaged in various public departments throughout the State had a right to expect that they should be permitted to keep holy the Sabbath and abstain from labour one day in the seven. He (Col. Prince) did not profess to be a very straight-laced man, but he trusted he should ever be willing to support a measure for preserving the sanctity of the Sabbath, and he hoped the Ministry would not offer their opposition to so just, proper, and reasonable a demand.

Hon. Mr. DEBLAQUIERE considered it would be derogatory to the House to move another Address to His Excellency on this subject, seeing that no attention had been paid to the previous Address. He knew of no public interest which should be allowed to stand in direct opposition to the commands of Almighty God, and if the country acted in opposition to those demands, we could expect nothing but ruin to overtake us. Nations were called to account in the generation in which they existed, and surely they had seen enough to convince them that national sins were visited by national punishments. This House, at all events, had power to free itself from associating in national guilt by perpetuating what was a violation of God's commandments. (Hear, hear.) Therefore, clearly seeing that the Government would do nothing further in this matter than they were forced to do, he would now in the name of the thousands of petitioners who, during the last three or four years, had prayed for the passing of a measure such as that now before the House, move the first reading of the Bill.

The Bill was then read a first time.

Hon. Mr. DEBLAQUIERE moved that the Bill be read a second time on Monday next, which having been agreed to, the hon. gentleman moved that the further consideration of the motion relating to the petitions be deferred until Monday next.

Hon. Mr. MOORE suggested that the petitions should be referred to the Committee, to which would be referred the Bill in the event of its passing a second reading.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET, however, said the motion was quite in order, and it was then agreed to.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 4 o'clock

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FOLEY supported the motion for adjourning the debate, reading largely from works on Parliamentary precedents, in reference to the effect of moving the previous question.

While the hon. gentleman was speaking or reading, the Government and their friends kept up a variety of interesting entertainments, in the shape, of singing, cock-crowing, &c. The members for Berthier (Mr. Piche) and Richelieu (Mr. Sincennes) were the principal performers in the singing department, assisted at intervals by the Attorney General West and others. The cock-crowing was accomplished with most success by the member for Kamouraska, (Mr. Capais) and the member for Ottowa city (Mr. R. Scott) did the barking, on the whole very creditably. It was generally admitted, however, that the conductors of the singing (some of the Canadian boat songs being sung in parts) furnished most entertainment to the House, and to the handful of strangers who lingered in the galleries.

The point of order being raised, whether the singing should be permitted,

The SPEAKER ruled that it was decidedly most disorderly.

Mr. WALLBRIDGE, at five o'clock, took the floor, but was relieved from the necessity of much speaking, in consequence of the attention of the House being monopolized by the musical performance on the other side.

Mr. SHERWOOD raised a point of order. He thought the Speaker should preserve order.

The SPEAKER—To preserve order does not depend on the Speaker alone. He must be assisted by the House.

Mr. FOLEY—Hear! hear! It is evident all the disorder is on the Government side of the House.

The Concert led by the member for Berthier in the north-west corner of the House was then resumed with undiminished vigour.

Mr. D. A. MACDONALD rose to a point of order. He complained that the French members had monopolized the whole of the morning with French songs. Although he did not wish to contribute to the disorder of the House, if the singing was continued, he and his Scotch friends must be allowed to start a Gaelic song in self-defence.—(Hear, hear.)

Mr. WALLBRIDGE then resumed his remarks and was listened to for a few minutes. The motion for the previous question, moved by the member for Carleton, he said was characterized by the best writers as a trick. If so, was it not insulting to the dignity of the House, if it had any? He called upon the House, as it valued its own reputation, to vote down this trick and subterfuge.

Mr. MCKELLAR next took the floor, and occupied it for about an hour, giving place once or twice to

Mr. PANET, who informed the House that he had served as a private volunteer, that his loyalty was indisputable, that he was a cosmopolitan or citizen of the world, being able to eat a bushel of potatoes with the Irishman, twenty pounds of "ros bif" with the Englishman, and to drink a Scotchman blue over his own favourite Ferintosh.

Mr. MATTICE mounted guard for the next hour, and filled his time in a manner interesting to the House, by dipping here and there into the Public Accounts, and commenting on various important financial enquiries, which the motion of the Attorney General would prevent the Committee on Public Accounts from investigating this session.

At 11 o'clock Mr. BENJAMIN moved that the Election Committees be adjourned till to-morrow in consequence of the House being in session.

At two o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair, which was filled by Mr. Galt until the Speaker returned to the House at a few minutes before three.

About this time several motions for adjournment were made and lost.

Mr. FERGUSON took the floor at half-past two. He gave a general dissertation on the multifarious subjects appearing on the notice paper and dwelt particularly upon his own motion respecting Seperate Schools. (He sat down amid cries of "Question!" and "Call in the members!")

The members were then called in and the vote taken on Mr. Brown's resolution for the adjournment of the debate on the motion for the previous question. The motion was lost by 58 to 28.

Mr. HOGAN, at ten minutes to 3 o'clock, moved that the House do now adjourn, saying he proposed this resolution to avoid a question which would necessarily arise in ten minutes from that time—whether the debate should run into another Parliamentary day.

Mr. BROWN supported the motion and stated how necessary it was for the members to obtain some rest after the prolonged session to which they had been subjected by the hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial benches. At three o'clock he asked whether the day was now to be regarded as Tuesday or Wednesday.

The SPEAKER said that the day now was the continuation of the sitting of Tuesday.

Mr. BROWN said that he could find no precedent in the English Parliamentary proceedings of a case in which the House of Commons had sat from day through to the next day, and therefore he was unable to say what had been done there; but in Washington, where they followed a very strict Parliamentary rule, the custom was when the House sat from one day past the ordinary time of meeting the following day to take up the business of the new day. The hon. member read from a work upon the Congressional rules, a statement that the business order of each day ceased with the cessation of the day for which it was appointed. Now one rule of the House here was that the House should meet at three o'clock in the afternoon and another rule was that the ordinary daily proceedings of the House should be first presenting petitions, next reading petitions, and so forth.

The SPEAKER said that in England when the House passed over one day and into the next, a note was made of the day being passed over; but the sitting was continued. The rule of the House certainly was that it should meet at three o'clock, but it could not meet unless it had adjourned. The difficulty could only be met by an adjournment. With respect to the American rule he believed it had been correctly cited; but that was only the order in Congress, and the English custom was the other way. He therefore decided that the day was continued from the preceeding evening.

Mr. BROWN said that the occasion was so important that he would appeal from the decision.

A division took place on the appeal, and the members were found to sustain the Speaker.—Yeas 60; Nays 34.

Mr. PATRICK said it was a gross act of injustice to every member of the House, as well as to the Speaker, thus to remain in session for twenty-four hours. What was the use of it? It gave the opportunity to the Opposition to attack the Government, but they were so case-hardened that they did not care for that, as long as they had a subservient majority to back them.

Mr. JOHN CAMERON was prepared to sit till this time to-morrow, in order to have the main motion adopted.

Mr. DORION went over the argument, showing the unconstitutional character of the course proposed by the ministry. He considered however, that the Opposition had done all they could to sustain the rights of the House, and he was of opinion that they should allow the vote on the main question to be taken, throwing on the Ministry the responsibility of taking a course which would have the effect of leaving much important business undisposed of at the close of the session.

Mr. BROWN spoke briefly to the same effect, expressing his concurrence in the view taken by Mr. Dorion.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD referred to the closing proceedings of Parliament of 1851-'54. An attempt was made by the Ministry of that day to stifle enquiry, and prorogue Parliament, and the result was that the people re-elected those who had stood up for their rights and resisted the arbitrary conduct of the Government. The ground taken up by the Opposition on this occasion in resistance to a similar arbitrary proceeding, he was confident would be sustained by the verdict of the country.

The previous question was then carried on a division.

The vote being taken on the main motion of the Attorney General West, it was carried by 62 to 37.

YEAS—Messrs. Alleyn, Baby, Benjamin, Buchanan, John Cameron, Malcolm Cameron, Campbell, Carling, Caron, Cayley, Attorney General Cartier, Chapais, Cimon, Coutlee, Daly, Daoust, Desaulniers, Dionne, Drummond, Dubord, Dufresne, Dunkin, Ferguson Ferres, Fortier, Galt, Gaudet, Gauvreau, Gill, Gowan, Harwood, Heath, Holmes, Laoelle, Lacoste, Ladorte, La Boutillier, Loranger, Macbeth, Attorney General Macdonald, MacLeod, McCann, Morrison, Ouimet, Playfair, Pope, W. F. Powell, Robinson, Solicitor General Rose, R. W. Scott, Wm. Scott, Sherwood, Sicotte, Simard, Simpson, Sincennes, Sidney Smith, Talbot, Tasse, Tett, Thibaudeau, and Webb—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Aikins, Allan, Bell, Biggar, Bourassa, Brown, Bureau, Burwell, Cauchon, Christie, Clark, Connor, Dorion, Foley, Gould, Hartman, Hogan, Howland, Laframboise, John S. Macdonald, Mackenzie, McGee, McKellar, Mowat, Munro, Notman, Papineau, Patrick, Piche, Walker Powell, Ross, Rymal, Short, Skirton, Wallbridge, White, and Wright—37.

Mr. BROWN said that, although the session had lasted for three months, yet in consequence of adjournments moved by the Government to enable them to prepare their business, the House had only sat 48 days. Of these the Government had had 27, including the discussion on the Address; 15 had been devoted to election business, and to measures in the hands of private members, during the whole session only 6 days had been devoted. This fact clearly showed the injustice of taking away another day from private measures.

The Gold Discoveries.

The Globe says, a gentleman well known in Toronto, and highly esteemed, proposes to pay an immediate visit to British Oregon, where gold has recently been discovered, and desires to be informed whether there are persons in Canada who would be likely to associate themselves with him, with a view, first, to obtain reliable information in reference to the position of the country and the prospects which it holds out to settlers; and, secondly, to make arrangements for the transmission of emigrants, and their location there. This gentleman desires to be addressed "Vancouver, box 363, Toronto Post Office," and will, we have no doubt, receive numerous answers to his call. We lately mentioned that the best route to British Oregon for individuals was that by the Isthmus of Panama and San Francisco, having at that time no thought of large companies of emigrants being formed.—However, if the plans of "Vancouver" were carried out, we think there would be no difficulty in such companies as he proposes to form making a journey overland, not only in quicker time and with less expense, but even with less exposure to disease and danger than by the Pacific route. The journey to the Red River, either by the Canadian route through Lake Superior or by St. Pauls and then over the plains, is quite practicable; and to give an idea of the country beyond, it is only necessary to say that Sir George Simpson travelled from Fort Garry to the Pacific Ocean in twenty-seven days, stopping at the Company's posts by the way. Horses and all the necessary supplies could easily be secured at the Red River. If the gold fields by Frazer's River are at the head waters of that stream, there will be a great saving of distance. As most of our readers are aware, it is perfectly possible for a person entering a canoe at Toronto to float it, without any other aid than the labour of two men into the Pacific Ocean; and it is possible that from the Red River it might be advisable to travel by water rather than by land.—The head waters of the Saskatchewan and those of the Peace River approach each other within a few yards. The transit of Canada emigrants overland will undoubtedly have a very favourable effect in breaking up the Quarantine which the Hudson's Bay Company have preserved over the territory. The emigrant trains in search of gold cannot pass through the magnificent prairies of the Saskatchewan without leaving some traces of their progress in the shape of settlers.

Naval Preparations for the British Cruisers.

Orders have been received at Brooklyn Navy Yard, from the Navy Department at Washington, to fit out the propeller Arctic, the frigate Sabine, and the razee Savannah, as speedily as possible, for the reinforcement of the Squadron. Commander Harstiene having volunteered to go to the Gulf to protect American commerce from the aggressions of British cruisers, had been appointed to the command of the Arctic, and her outfit has been pushed forward with dispatch. Yesterday three guns were mounted upon her: two thirty-two pounders, and one eighteen pounder swivel. She is provisioned for three months, and carries a crew of forty men, including a guard of marines. Her officers are: Commander Harstiene, Lieuts. Mullaney, Rochelle and McCrae, Engineer Stimer, and Surgeon Hudson. Her outfit will be completed and she will sail probably on Wednesday.

The Arctic was one of the vessels sent out to the North Seas, under Commander Hartstiene, in search of Dr. Kane. She is a little tub, with no great pretensions to sea-going qualities, except her staunchness, having been built for a light ship. She was originally very strong and the additional sheating and bracing which she has received to fit her for the Arctic service rendered her as stiff as a seventy-four. Her engine, however, is nothing to brag of, being capable under the most favorable circumstances, of driving her along only about 8 knots an hour. Commander Harstiene, however, will no doubt do the best he can with the limited means at his command, to maintain the honour and dignity of the nation.

The steam-frigate Wabash goes into commission to-day, and will sail for the gulf at once.

The little steamer Water Witch, Lieut. Lovell, commanding, sailed yesterday for Washington with a draft of men for the sloop-of-war Plymouth. By the way, why not send the Plymouth, which is quite ready for sea, down the gulf, instead of the fancy cruise as Ordnance Practice ship, on which she is about to sail? In the present emergency, when the government is clamouring for new sloops-of-war, why not make some practical use of those we have already. The Water Witch will be fitted out at Washington, and dispatched to the Gulf in charge of Commander John Rogers.

The old war frigate Sabine, begun some 25 years ago, and not finished yet, will probably be in a sailing trim in about six weeks. She is waiting the departure of the Wabash to take her place under the shears, and receive her masts. The razee Savannah is still in the dock, and will not be ready for sea in less than six weeks.

Swill Milk and Lager Bier.

The great city is periodically attacked by a violent fit of peritanical, moral, and sanatory enthusiasm. The return of fever and ague to our mortal frames is not more regular, than the annual crusade of our City Sachems against the evils of Sunday trading, and of selling unwholesome provisions. Only this week, with the first edition of asparagus in our mouths, and while the palate yet feels sentimental under the delicate of Spring's choicest gifts, our eyes are astonished and our digestions impaired by the revelations of the lager bier and swill-milk trades.

One of our weekly cotemporaries opened his batteries by a series of pictorial and descriptive attacks upon the system of manufacturing milk for our juvenile population; and in the nurseries of Gotham a voice of lamentation and horror was raised. Not content with the harmless product of the cow with an iron tail, our dealers in pure country milk have, as it appears, continued to poison the whole community with a deleterious compound called swill milk, made from the cow with the inoculated tail—for, like children for the small-pox, city cows must be treated homœopathically for what may be called the swill-fever, the effect being manifested in a gradual disappearance of the vital principle. The streets are full of colored representations of the loathsome manner of desecration by which the poor were not the chief sufferers. The window of the darkened chamber being usually left a little way open, and watchers by the corpse not being customary in houses of the rich, thieves entering by the window laid their hands on the unburied.

In those days, too, if anybody was found drowned in a canal and brought to shore, it was a common thing for some ruffian to affect loud grief, to claim the corpse as that of a dear wife or daughter, and cause it to be carried to the lodging, out of which it presently departed in a sack to be exchanged for nine or ten pieces of gold. The body was thus in every sense disposed of. After a few days under the hands of the dissector all trace of its identity had vanished. Here was, for society, the most terrible fact of all. When the value of a dead body was great, when towns were full of unconsidered friendless men whom nobody would miss, and whose muscles and bones were as valuable as those of kings, the last hindrance to crime in the minds of those who feared only the vengeance of the law was removed, for the perplexing question, how to destroy the evidence of crime remaining in the body of the victim, was removed entirely, and the price of blood was paid by the same hand that destroyed the evidence of guilt.

For some time murder had been one source of coure a comparatively small source, still a source—of supply to the dissecting-rooms, and had not been suspected by the surgeons, though there were some few of them whom the habit of receiving into schools of anatomy subjects for the use of pupils without any close inquiry into the manner of obtaining them, led to a degree of negligence unquestionably criminal. The truth first flashed upon the country at Edinburgh. A half-witted man, friendless, but well known to sight in Edinburgh streets, was no more seen. Edinburgh is not so large a town but that a man well known by sight can be missed, and his disappearance talked about. Some question arose as to the disappearance of Daft Jamie, into the midst of which a medical student brought the news that he had seen him on a certain day and at a certain time laid out in a certain dissecting-room. Nearly about the same time he was known to have been in the street alive and hale as usual. Clamour arose. The house of Dr. Knox (to whom the dissecting-room in question belonged) was stormed by the populace, and the doctor was mobbed.

The trial of William Burke, whose name has added a word to the English language, took place at Edinburgh, on the day before Christmas Day in the year eighteen hundred and twenty-eight. He was tried for three murders, Hare being evidence against him, and confessed, after conviction, that within a few months he and Hare had committed sixteen murders, selling the body in each case to Dr. Knox in Surgeon's Square. When trafficking, they represented to the Doctor, to avert suspicion, that they had purchased these bodies, of relations of the dead in different parts of the town. No suspicion seemed to have been excited. Hare kept a lodging-house, and tried lodgers with drink. If they would drink till they lay powerless on the floor, they were then suffocated—one man holding the mouth, nose, and chin, the other holding the whole body down and pressing on the breast. It was only at the previous Christmas that Hare, having joined with Burke to sell the body of a lodger who had died in his debt, first learned with how little enquiries dead bodies were taken, and how well they were paid for. A twelvemonth contained everything; the temptation, the multitude of murders, the conviction, and the sentence to be hanged.

In eighteen hundred and thirty-one, a similar career of murder was cut short in London by the detection of Bishop and Williams. They were professed bodysnatchers. Bishop had followed the business for twelve years, and had sold, he said, from five hundred to a thousand bodies; but he confessed to only three murders: that of a boy, which led to his detection, that of a wretched woman whom he found sitting desolate with a child in her arms on the step of a door near Shoreditch church, and that of a poor boy, whom he and Williams found sleeping in the pig-market in Smithfield. As professed resurrection-men, their appearance with a body at a London hospital tended more to deaden than excite suspicion of foul play; but Mr. Partridge, then demonstrator, now professor, of anatomy at King's College, when the body of one of their victims was brought to the dissecting-room of that medical school, perceived a double reason for suspicion. The body was recently dead, the rigidity of death was upon it, the limbs were doubled and had not been laid out; and, at the same time, one of the men, by whom it was brought, volunteered an obvious falsehood, in saying that it had been taken "in the regular way"—meaning, from a grave. The police were sent for, and, to detain the suspected men, until they came, Mr. Partridge produced a fifty pound note for payment, and asked for change. They offered to go for change, but the anatomist preferred going himself, and bidding them await his return, went out to hasten the arrival of the officers of justice. There was a very bare case for suspicion. Had the man said, that the boy was found drowned (for indeed he had been suffocated in a well), it might have been supposed that he was obtained by a trick common among body-snatchers, and no more question might have been asked. Suspicion was increased also in the mind of the police inspector by the fact that a youth—though as it proved another youth—was just then advertised as missing. The three men, much to their consternation, were accordingly arrested, and two of them, being proved murderers, were hanged. They themselves were sent afterwards to King's College for dissection, and the skeleton of Bishop stands in the museum there, bobbing a bit of his own skin, on which an indignant tanner had begged leave to exercise his art.

This new discovery of the inquiries of Bishop, following upon the resolutions in the case of Burke, caused an end to be put to the existing state of things. Pending a parliamentary inquiry, public opinion, and opinion also among the members of the profession, [illegible] the law for the purpose in the country to study his profession.

It was thought that subjects might be brought from France, and an attempt was made to begin their importation; but the smugglers seized their opportunity at the same time, and caused to arrive with rolls of lace in their dead mouths. The desecration was intolerable, and that source of supply was abandoned. Physicians, zealous for their art, left their own bodies to dissecting-rooms. An eminent Anatomist was called upon by a professional friend who said to him, "Do you know Doctor —— (we will say Doctor Smith) has left his body to you."

"Is he dead?"

"No; but he will be in a day or two, and he wants very much to see you."

The Anatomist went, and found the old physician lying in his window with the evening sun shining upon a thin face.

"I am glad you have come," he said, "I want you to hear this clause in my will." He pulled the will from beneath his pillow, and read the bequest of himself to the scalpel.

"But, my dear sir," it was urged, "does not this distress your wife? You are not called upon to sacrifice the feelings of those who are dear to you——"

"Enough, enough. That is all settled. I have one request to make. I am dying of some affection of the lungs, which I attribute to the irritation from a rib I broke some years ago. I wish you would remember to look and see whether I am right on that point. Also, one thing more. I am a bit of a phrenologist, and I should like to have a cast taken of my head before I die. Could you get that done for me?"

"Certainly, if you wish it."

"When?"

"This is Monday. Shall I send on Wednesday?"

"No; Wednesday may be too late. Send to-morrow."

The physician died, and the anatomist thought that his last wishes might be sufficiently respected without more outrage to the distracted feelings of his wife, if there were a simple post-mortem examination into the causes of death.

To this same anatomist, there was made known, in a very remarkable way, the extent of the wretchedness of a poor creature who wrote to him at the Hospital with which he was connected, signing herself "Caroline W.," and telling him that she was an unfortunate woman weary of life, and eager to lay her burden down if she could quit the world able to pay the few pounds that she owed to creditors. For these reasons, she wished to sell her body. She was of such an age—so tall, so stout—a fair complexion; and she might be seen on the Strand side of Temple Bar at a certain hour on a certain day. If he would buy her for dissection she did not want any money for herself; only his word of honour that he would pay those who might bring her body to his rooms. If he did not accept her offer, she would find somebody who would. The opinion of the police-inspector of the district was taken on the letter. Was it a bad jest? The inspector declared his belief that it was terribly earnest, and undertook to do what he considered best. He appeared at the appointed place of meeting, and scared the wretched soul away. No more was heard of her.

The disclosures made before a parliamentary committee, led to the establishment of the "Act for regulating schools of Anatomy," commonly called the Anatomy Act, now in force. By that Act, nobody can practice anatomy without a license from the Secretary of State, who appoints also inspectors of schools of anatomy. It is the duty of the inspectors to make quarterly returns of all subjects removed for anatamical examination, and to visit, at discretion, all dissecting rooms. By this Act, any person not an undertaker holding it for purpose of interment, who has lawful keeping of the body of a deceased person may permit anatomical examination of it, if no known relative objects, and if the deceased have not in the last illness expressed objection. In no case can a body be removed for such examination within forty-eight hours after decease, or without a certificate from the inspector of anatomy, which can be obtained only in return for a satisfactory medical certificate of the cause of death. No teacher of anatomy shall receive any body for examination with which the certificate of the inspector is not brought, and that certificate he shall send back to the inspector of anatomy together with a full return of various particulars. Contravention of these rules is punished with three months' imprisonment or with a fine of fifty pounds.

These regulations have entirely put an end to the old forms of body-snatching, have made murder for dissection quite impossible, and have so far tended to supply the anatomist with better means of study, that the price of a subject to the student in this country is now four pounds, instead of ten. The Act, however, does not put an end to the villainous jobbing in corpses which is still within the power of an undertaker who can get the master of a workhouse to assist his views.

The undertakers combine to extort money from the hospitals under the name of burial fees, which they raise from time to time; and the raising of which, hospitals resist as well as they can. Though the Anatomy Act specially forbids undertakers charged with the burial of a body to exercise any influence that shall concern the anatomist, he, nevertheless contrives, whenever the master of a workhouse will assist in procuring for each body surreptitiously obtained the necessary documents, to play the part of body-snatcher.

Most of our readers will remember the details made public at the late trial of the master of the Newington workhouse, for supplying bodies of the poor to Guy's Hospital in an illegal manner; the undertaker, who was chief offender, being released from prosecution on condition that he would bear witness against his accomplice. The undertaker said, that he could go to the dead-houses when he pleased. He was in the habit of taking the bodies of paupers who had died out of the workhouse into this dead-house. The relieving officer authorized him to do this. He also used to bring the remains of the dissected paupers from the hospital to be buried. In these cases the hospital paid the expense of the funeral. Three pounds ten shillings was paid by the hospital for each case. The parish only paid him five shillings and sixpence. For all the cases where the substitution took place, he was paid both by the parish and the hospital. He received two payments by this means for the burial of the same body. He was not aware that he had no right to do this. The amount allowed by the parish for the burial of paupers would be utterly insufficient, if it were not for the additional sum received from the hospital for the mutilated bodies.

That last statement is true, and no one man can doubt that the low payment was made with the tacit understanding that there were valuable perquisites [illegible] and extortion connected [illegible] undertaker's office. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Rivière du Loup, June 1st.

The steamer Indian, from Liverpool on 19th ult, passed here this morning.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In the House of Commons on the 17th ultimo, the debate on the resolution concerning the Government for publication of the Indian despatch was resumed. The speakers in favour of the resolution, included Sir C. Hood, Mr. Byng, Sir C. Lewis and others, and those against it, Mr. Roebuck, Sir R. Peel, Mr. Whiteside, &c. The Government supporters denounced the effort as a mere party scheme to drive out the present Ministry. On the 18th ult., in the Commons the debate upon the vote of censure was continued without eliciting anything of importance, being confined to mere asking and answering questions. A committee was granted to enquire into the best means of manning the Navy. The House adjourned till Thursday; Wednesday being the Derby day.

The London Morning Chronicle affirms that the Peelites will vote with the Government on the resolutions of censure, and that the ministry will have a majority. The Times regards the speedy formation of a new ministry as inevitable, and says it must be constructed on the most liberal basis. The Star says that in the event of the Derby Cabinet not being broken up, the Marquis of Candos will most likely be Colonial Secretary.

LONDON, TUESDAY EVENING.

The Gazette contains a General Order announcing that Her Majesty has promoted Colonel Sir William Mansfield to the rank of Major General in recognition of his valuable services as Chief of the Staff in India.

INDIA.

The Bombay Times accuses General Roberts of having suffered the army of Kotah to escape, Koer Singh having carried off two millions sterling in his retreat. This is thought to be exaggerated. The Ranee of Jhansi had escaped, and was bringing back a large body of troops to besiege the English at Jhansi.

Later Indian news is telegraphed from Malta, but dates are not given.

Kotah fugitives were making for Calpee, where it was thought the rebels would make a stand.

A small Bombay force defeated the rebels in the Maltpora Mountains; otherwise, all was quiet in that Presidency.

NAPLES.

The correspondent of the Daily News is informed that the answer of the Neapolitan Government to the English note is decidedly negatived. It asserts the guilt of the English engineers; maintains that the King of Naples performed an act of grace, and claims that there is no ground for indemnity.

TURKEY.

It is asserted that numerous Russian agents are busily employed in the Slavonic provinces of Turkey, preparing people for a general insurrection, and that Prince Daniel will probably head the movement.

The Paris Monsteur of the 18th says the entry of Turkish troops into the territory of Grahora, has caused the Western powers to take new steps with Turkey, and the Sultan, listening to their advice, had sent instructions on the 14th, for the suspension of hostilities. The Monsteur thinks there is every reason to hope the affair will soon be peaceably adjusted.

Arrival of the "Harmonia."

NEW YORK, June 1.

Nothing important had been done in Parliament. The debate on the Indian Bill was resumed in the Commons but no action had been taken up to the 18th.

Telegraph despatches from Bombay, received from Malta, state that Azimghur was relieved on the 15th of April by General Lugard with but trifling loss.

Brigadier Seaton defeated the rebels near Futtinghur, killing and wounding 300, and capturing their guns and ammunition.

A body of rebels in the Maltpoora Mountains had also been defeated.

A large number of Bheels had also been defeated in the Sanpore Hills, and 500 captured. British loss severe, including 5 officers.

General Rose had delayed his advance upon Calpee in consequence of the threatened demonstrations of the rebels upon Jhansi.

AUSTRIA.

A Vienna despatch says the Montenegrians had attacked the Turks near Ghakora and nearly annihilated their whole force killing their commander Kamel Pasha, and capturing all their guns. The Montenegrians' loss was 200 killed and wounded. The Turks numbered 7,000 strong, and the Montenegrians 5,000.

The London Times says rumours are prevalent in political circles, concerning the intention of France towards Belgium, and that at Brussels the prospect of a French invasion was a familiar topic of discussion.

The Cologne Gazette says the fortifications of Konigsberg are to be considerably strengthened, and 16 additional forts are to be erected at Spardam.

WASHINGTON, June 1.

PAPER AND STATIONERY
WHOLESALE.

THE Subscribers, in calling the attention of the trade and merchants generally to their Stock of PAPERS AND STATIONERY, beg to state that they are now receiving the Papers manufactured at Four Extensive Mills—that they are sole agents for the FIRST PRIZE

Canadian Manufactured Writing, Printing and Wrapping Papers.

The Mills with which they are connected having taken all the First Prizes for Paper at Kingston in 1846, and in Montreal in 1857.

Their CANADIAN MANUFACTURED WRITING PAPERS are 25 per cent cheaper than imported papers of a similar quality; and as one large Mill is now devoted exclusively to this branch, the quality of the Goods is daily improving, while the increased production has enabled the makers to reduce their prices equal to 10 per cent. from former rates. An unusually large Stock of also on hand, at reduced rates.

The ordinary sizes of PRINTING PAPER always in Stock, and Paper of any size and weight made to order.

AND LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

THE DIRECTORS of the Peterborough Mechanics Institute and Library Association respectfully invite the co-operation of the inhabitants of the Town and vicinity to the sustaining of a good READING ROOM and LIBRARY in their midst. The advantages of such must in so evident to every one, that they do not consider it necessary to urge them here. About 100 Papers and Periodicals from different parts of the Canadas and the United States, are received weekly in the Reading Room; and it is intended, should sufficient encouragement be received, to procure in addition to these at an early day, some of the leading British Newspapers. The Library contains 250 volumes, to which additions are constantly being made. The terms of subscription have been placed very low so as to place the advantages within the reach of every person in the community. The establishment of the subscription is 7s 6d, to all whom 10s 1½ payable half yearly in advance. Subscriptions will be received, at any time, by the Secretary at the Reading Room, in the Secretary's office, Burnham's Block, or at the Bookstore of Messrs. Sawers & Murray.

ARTIFICIAL STONE.
Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all exercess of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Tops, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT. CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay b

Atlantic Steam Navigation.

We copy the following from the correspondence of the Montreal Herald. The facts stated in reference to Steam Communication across the Atlantic will be found very interesting at present, when our noble line of Steamers is commanding the admiration of all, even of our prejudiced friends across the line, who propose now, we believe an agreement with the Canadian Steamers for the transmission of the U. S. Mails.—At the same time it is only justice to one holding the position of Dr. Lardner to give publicity to these letters:—

THE HON. WENDALL PHILIPS AND DR. LARDNER.

(To the Editor of the Montreal Herald)

SIR,—The Honourable Wendall Philips, in his Lecture on the "Lost Arts," delivered before the Mercantile Library Association, on the 11th inst., stated that the first steam vessel from Britain to America brought with it Dr. Lardner's opinion that it was impossible to cross the Atlantic in a steamer. The announcement produced all the effect the lecturer could reasonably anticipate; but, unfortunately, it is entirely without foundation. Not only so, but, as Dr. Lardner's view were published in August, 1836, and the "Sirius" did not sail for New York till April, 1838 there is, evidently, a straining at effect in saying the "first steamer" brought them; but he who would be a popular lecturer must not be very particular.

Apart from the interest which personal kindness received from Dr. Lardner makes me feel towards him, and the desire to see justice done to a man to whom the present generation are much indebted, the bearing of the statement in the lecture is such that I venture to trouble you with the facts of the case; and I believe Mr. Philips will be very glad to have the opportunity of correcting his mistake, for I imagined he is desirous of rendering unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's.

The idea of establishing steam communication between Europe and America did not assume a definite form till the year 1836.

For a good many years previous to this date, however, steamers had plied regularly between Glasgow and Liverpool, Glasgow and Belfast, Dundee and London, London and Rotterdam, Bristol and Cork, &c., &c., and in the year 1821 the mail service between Dublin and Holyhead, and Dover and Calais, was performed by steamers.

Several years prior to 1836 lines of steamers had been established between Great Britain and ports in the Mediterranean, having such places as Corunna, Lisbon and Gibraltar as coaling stations.

Steam vessels had thus for a good many years been sailing in waters quite as stormy as the waters of the Atlantic, and the question to every one in the least acquainted with the subject in 1836 was, "Can steamers carry a sufficient quantity of coal to serve the voyage between Britain and America?"

This really was the point about which so much was written and spoken.

To believe that Dr. Lardner—a man eminent for his learning, and, be it remarked, for his knowledge of the powers of the steam-engine—should, in the face of this evidence, assert that the crossing of the Atlantic in a steamer was an impossibility, is surely asking to believe too much.

But these were not the only grounds for inferring the practicability of steamers crossing the Atlantic.

On the 25th of May, 1819 the New York built steamer "Savannah" sailed from Savannah and arrived in Liverpool on the 20th of June, having run a part of the way under canvas. She afterwards visited Denmark, Norway and Russia, and returned to Savannah in the month of November of the same year.

This was the first steamer that crossed the Atlantic.

I think I am correct in saying that the "Curacoa" also crossed the Atlantic before 1836, but cannot at present refer to authorities.

It may, therefore, be said it was utterly impossible Dr. Lardner could mean that steam vessels could not cross the Atlantic, as he and all others interested in the matter knew the voyage had already been performed.

In 1836 two companies proposed running steamers between Great Britain and America. One proposed making a port on the West Coast of Ireland, Halifax and Boston their stations; the other proposed making Bristol and New York their stations. At the meeting of the British Association for the promotion of Science, held in Dublin that year, Dr. Lardner advocated the former of these projects.

The next meeting of the British Association was held in Bristol, on the 25th of August, 1837, to which the Times sent a special reporter, with particular instructions to report the discussion on the Atlantic steam voyage. In the Times of the 27th of August the report appeared, of which the following is an extract:—

"Dr. Lardner said he would beg of any one, and more especially of those who had a direct interest in the inquiry, to dismiss from their minds all previously-formed judgments about it, and stong especially on this question, as he grounded against the conclusion of mere theory; for if ever there was one point in practice, of a commercial nature, which more than another required to be founded on experience, it was this one of extending steam navigation to voyages of extraordinary length. He was aware they were the greatest hard ordeals, at least there existed that his own opinions were averse to it. That statement was totally wrong; but he did not lend that great weight, should the proposition of the adoption of the means of carrying out the project into effect. Almost all improvement, at the first entrance, for a difficulty would start behind the ordinary considerations of the human."

Mr. Guest Rankin said that he had listened with great attention to the interesting statements which had been made by Dr. Lardner. It seemed to him that the question was one of great importance, and that it would be a subject of regret if the Association should separate without some further discussion upon it. He was aware that the subject was one of great difficulty, and that it was one which required to be treated with great caution; but he thought that the Association would be wanting in its duty if it did not express some opin as they knew that all these charges of bribery and corruption were against members of the Administration and their supporters, and it was very suspicious that the member for Hastings put a clause into his motion, that these enquiries should not affect the seats of members, no matter how great the grounds that might be proved against them.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD—No! Cannot even recommend the House to unseat him. He moved that the resolution be amended by striking out the words "with out thereby affecting the seats of members."

Atty. Gen. CARTIER—No objection.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD—And that it be an instruction to the committee to enquire into the cases of Montreal, Quebec and Verchores.

Atty Gen. CARTIER—Put in Toronto.

Mr. BROWN—Certainly.

Hon J. S. MACDONALD said he was always willing to show respect for members of the Administration, and therefore gave them the precedence. (Laughter.) But he was quite willing to add Toronto to his motion. The members of the Administration, he hoped, would not be afraid to consent that they should be the first to pass through the ordeal.

Mr. BENJAMIN had taken no instructions; but he certainly had consulted the Attorney General, after he drew his motion. He was willing to strike out the words objected to; but he should object to any addition.

Mr. FERRES thought that if there were to be any instructions to the Committee, the gentlemen on his side the House might wish to begin with the member for Grey, or the member for South Oxford; and then go to the member for Montreal, Mr. McGee.

Mr. McGEE—I want you to do so, and have done so.

Mr. FERRES—Oh, that was all understood. The hon. member knew that members on his side of the House would adhere to law, and that was his security. But if this motion was carried it would show that while they were determined to adhere to law, they would also adhere to equity, so that it did not affect the seats of members. —(Ironical cheers from the Opposition.)—They were ready to have a full enquiry made in order to the suggestion of remedies. The Committee might even enquire how it was that certain election petitions were withdrawn by agreement, especially when there was but a majority of one.

Dr. CONNOR was perfectly willing.

Mr. ROSE had no objection to the members of the committee individually; but it was formed in some part of the Hospital—(the Government offices)—over the way. The Committee was one named by the Government, and it ought not to insist upon the reference of these matters to such a body. What fair play could be expected from such a Committee—from parties who had treated as matters of no moment all questions of this kind, and who, from one reason or another had followed exactly in the course marked out for them by the members of the Government. He moved to strike out the words "Committee of Privileges and Elections" and to insert the words "a Special Committee of nine members to be named by the House."

Mr. W. F. POWELL said that the hon. member for Beauce had now a great horror of that corrupt hospital; but he must say that when he supported the Government while the hon. member was a member of it, he received as much blame as any one could do, on account of supporting stupid and incapable people. The hon. member's own seat had been contested by Mr. Chapman through a whole session, during which Mr. Rose relied on mere technicalities, and at the end of the time got the expenses paid out of the Contingent fund, because he could not pay for it himself.

Mr. BROWN said that the attack of the hon. member for Carleton on the hon. member for Beauce was as usual with that gentleman's attacks utterly without foundation. Instead of Mr. Chapman having petitioned and Mr. Rose keeping the seat, Mr. Rose was the petitioner who was kept out of his seat by Mr. Chapman. And it ill became a gentleman who had all along supported the Government to which Mr. Rose had belonged to make the observations which had just been made as to that Government. Nothing could better show the intention of the present motion than the present member for Brome. The whole thing was intended to cast ridicule upon the inquiries into the election frauds so as to confuse the whole matter, and enable the gentlemen opposite and their followers, some of whom sat there as the House had declared by a majority of 300 forged votes to throw off the shame that attached to them, to make it appear that all members of the House were equally guilty. It was for this reason that the hon. gentleman talked about enquiring into the elections for Grey, Toronto and South Oxford. There was just as much truth in the insinuations with respect to those elections as there was in the statement made by the member for Carleton with respect to the member for Beauce.—For his part he defied and courted an enquiry into the Toronto election, and any motion made tending in that direction he would accept. There was no understanding whatever for the withdrawal of the petition against him, and he could only say, that there was not the slightest truth in the story. The petition was got up entirely by a man named Rees, and there was a story in it about his paying $5 a-day to 3 cabmen whose name he did not know, and with whom he had nothing to do. Then it was alleged that a certain House was kept open. It was utterly untrue. Not a sixpence was paid for keeping it open. He challenged the proof. As in South Oxford if the contest had gone on the sitting member would have established a majority of 60 or 70 votes. The petitioner, who was a personal friend of his own, abandoned the contest on account of the expenses and became so fond it useless to try to push it on. Let any enquiry into any election be asked for, and on behalf of the Grand Trunk they were ready to respond; but they did not expect fair play from a Committee having upon it 15 members of the Government, also of the House. That it was proposed to give this Committee a roving commission to take up just what they pleased, and to enquire as they liked, into what they liked, at the end of the session, when perhaps there would be no time for defence. The object was plain. Members knew that the votes they were giving to stop enquiry had brought a great storm of popular indignation against them and they were trying to stop it, by a motion that would give them a chance to tell their constituents that though they had opposed every single enquiry they wanted to make one enquiry on their. Such proceedings, carried through they may be, deceived no one. It was stated that this Committee of Privileges and Elections was appointed by a committing committee of which he was a member and that there was no objection. How could any objection be possible? there were four of his friends and four Rhinelanders on the committee, and how for Cornwall had on a former occasion voted to refer to that Committee the question of the recognizances of the Montreal petition. As to the statement of the member for Grey, that his election had cost him fewer pounds than his (Mr. Macdonald's) had cost him pounds, he was happy to hear it for the sake of the hon. member's pocket, for the Kingston election had not cost him a single sixpence. The member for Hastings, who thought, deserved the thanks of the House for making his motion. It had not originated in any suggestion of his (the Attorney General's), but it met with his cordial approval. If petition had been presented against the member for Grey, but had been dismissed on account of some informality in the recognizances.—Was it not right that there should be some enquiry as to that? A petition charging bribery and corruption against the junior member for Toronto; but by some mysterious arrangement, both petitions were withdrawn on the same day. Was not that somewhat to be enquired into? Being in Toronto at the time, he was aware that there was an extraordinary current of popular feeling in favour of the senior member —more the pity, he thought. Still, when so serious a charge was brought, and mysteriously disappeared, it was right to have it enquired into.

Mr. BROWN stated that his case differed widely from those of members and supporters of the Government who had fought off the petitions against them on the ground of informalities. But, though there were more serious informalities attaching to the petition against himself than to any other petition, he had entirely waived these, and all through had challenged enquiry. (Hear, hear.)

Major CAMPBELL did not think the motion of the member for Hastings sufficiently specific. The Committee should receive precise instructions what they were to do—that they should, for example, take up all petitions which had been presented to the House, and all petitions which had gone before judges, in the terms of the Act of last session.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND, while of opinion that the Committee on Elections and Privileges was the right tribunal to which to refer these matters, concurred in the view of the member for Rouville as to the necessity for making the subject more specific, if any practical good was to be done. He intimated that he would move an amendment to that effect, and hoped the hon. member for Cornwall would allow him to put it.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD declined doing so.

Mr. Macdonald's amendment was negatived on a division.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND then moved that all the words after "forthwith," in the original motion, be struck out, and that the following be added:—"That the said committee be authorised and instructed to enquire into all breaches of the election laws during the last general election proceeding to enquire in the first place, into all such matters as shall have been complained of in all the petitions presented to this House, and in all the petitions or notices presented submitted to any judge or commissioner, acting under the Act of last session relating to controverted elections, which have been rejected by reason of the inobservance of formalities, or for any other cause whatsoever —that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers—and that it be an instruction to the said committee that before proceeding to enquire into any election notice be given in writing to the petitioners if any, and to the sitting member, informing them of the day and hour on which such enquiry shall be proceeded with, and to report to the House their opinion as to the best means to punish for the past, and to prevent for the future, all such breaches of the law."

Atty. Gen. CARTIER suggested that all petitions yet to be received should be included in the motion.

Sol. Gen. ROSE suggested that it should include petitions "withdrawn" as well as "rejected."

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND accepted both suggestions, and incorporated them in his motion.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD said he wished to have his views, recorded on the Journals, and as he could not support the amendment in its present shape, he would move that the amendment to amend by striking out all the words after the word "that" and inserting the words following.—It is expedient that all complaints submitted by petition to this House, and not already referred to a Select Committee, by petitions, under the Election Acts of 1851 and 1857, complaining of bribery, corruption, violence, and all breaches of the law of election, be examined and enquired into at the bar of this House alone.

Mr. BROWN thought the general principle herein contained was a correct one; but at the same time he thought it could not be carried out. The election frauds had reached their climax, and he hoped the committee proposed would set themselves to work and endeavour to discover some remedy not only for the frauds themselves but also for cases of corruption of whatever kind. He trusted they would enquire into the laws in force in England for the prevention of bribery and corruption, and seriously consider if a similar system might not be advantageously adopted in Canada. (Hear, hear.) In England the election accounts of the candidates were submitted to auditors, and no such accounts were permitted to be paid without the certificates of these auditors. What the Attorney General had stated was perfectly true—there were some members returned at little expense to themselves; but he thought it would be admitted that in almost every election charges were made upon candidates of a most improper kind, and which it was almost impossible they could resist. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the amendment last proposed, he thought it was preferable that when enquiries such as this could not be referred to sworn committees, an examination should take place at the bar; but at the same time, as he was afraid the amendment of the hon. member for Cornwall would, were it to pass, remain a dead letter on the statute book, and as a remedy was urgently required, he trusted the amendments would be withdrawn, and the amendment of the hon. member for Rouville adopted, pro. tem.

Mr. MACDONALD said that if it pro. tem. destroyed, the proceedings before the Committee would cut into them with the investigations now pending at the bar, he withdrew his name as seconder.

Attorney General MACDONALD said that the adoption of the motion could not interfere with any right or privilege now possessed by the House.

Mr. McGEE then seconded Mr. Macdonald's amendment, in place of Mr. Drummond.

The amendment was put on a division, and Mr. Drummond's motion rejected.

The main motion as amended, was carried by 83 to 8; the majority being the Hon. J. S. Macdonald, and Messrs. Papineau, Archambault, and Rymal.

Dr. CONNOR said Mr. Mowatt had gone to Sydney (Cape Breton) on the contract. If the Opposition were desirous responsible for this enquiry they should have given notice of it.

to 5 members of the Opposition. He would move that Mr. Foley and Mr. Bell two members who had been elected without a contest, be added to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER—Your motion requires notice. I object.

The House at five minutes past one adjourned till Friday, Thursday being a holiday.

COBOURG AND PETERBORO' RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. SMITH moved the second reading of the Bill to enable the Cobourg and Peterboro' Railway Company to issue preferential bonds, and for other purposes.

In reply to remarks by Hon. J. S. Macdonald and Dr. Connor,

Hon. Mr. SMITH said that in the Railway Committee, he undertook that the bill would be made satisfactory to the bondholders. If this were not done, he would not bring it back to the House.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD said he had letters from parties in New York, protesting against any legislation which would affect their rights as bondholders. He hoped the hon. gentleman would allow the Bill to stand for the present.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I will not. But I promise that it shall not return from the Railroad Committee unless it has the assent of all the bondholders.

Mr. BROWN said that was not enough. Before consenting to the second reading, the House ought to understand what interest the province had in this Bill. He understood that it was interested to the extend of £10,000. Was it true that the Inspector General had advanced £10,000 to this bankrupt road, out of the Marriage License, or some other public fund, without the authority of Parliament, with no authority but his own, and without any proper security for the repayment of the money? He could not consent to vote for the second reading without a full explanation from the Inspector General. He was told that the money was advanced under the pretence that the Grand Trunk, at some future time, was to pay it to the Cobourg road. He wished to know whether the object of the Bill was the repayment of this £10,000.

Hon. Mr. CAYLEY said that £10,000 had been advanced to the Cobourg and Peterboro' Road, after consultations with the Grand Trunk authorities, and on their undertaking to repay the amount out of the two millions of preferential loan which they were authorized to raise, and the money had been repaid by the Grand Trunk. The amount was advanced by the Government out of the consolidated chest, from a special investment fund. The securities upon which the money was advanced were previously examined by the Grand Trunk Solicitor and accepted with their approval, and consisted of real estate and the chattel property of the road. At the present moment the Cobourg Road had no advances from the Government. The advances were by the Grand Trunk, in terms of the two millions Relief Act, which authorised the Grand Trunk to make these advances.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD asked when the £10,000 was advanced, and when it was repaid by the Grand Trunk. The circumstances now stated disclosed that the Grand Trunk had too much influence with the Government, when it induced the Government prior to the Grand Trunk being able to raise money in England, to advance this £10,000 from a special fund, and without any authority from Parliament.

Hon. Mr. CAYLEY—The money was lent in 1856, under the Relief Act and was paid back upwards of a year ago. As a condition of getting that Relief Act, the Legislature imposed upon the Grand Trunk the necessity of making certain advances to the Cobourg and Peterboro', the Port Hope and Lindsay, and the Prescott and Ottawa Railroads, amounting in all to £100,000 to the three roads, to enable them to be completed. The Cobourg Company then came forward and said that, unless they got an advance to make the bridge over Rice Lake, they must stop. The Grand Trunk had not then raised the money they were authorized to raise, and the Government accordingly, after consultation with the Grand Trunk, and on ample security, advanced the money, and the whole of it had since been repaid, principal and interest, by the Grand Trunk.

Mr. BROWN said that the hon. gentleman made the case worse than it was before.—This payment of £10,000 was made in 1856, and when was the Grand Trunk Relief Act passed? In 1857.

Mr. CAYLEY—In 1856.

Mr. BROWN said that the Act passed in 1856 was inoperative; the Company could raise no money under it; and another Act for their relief had to be passed last session. The money to be raised from this preferential loan was to be deposited with the agent of the Province, and was pari passu as each of the works proceeded. But, without waiting for the raising of these two millions, the Inspector General took it upon himself to go into the public chest, and, to serve his own ends, handed over £10,000 to this Company. And there were circumstances connected with the transaction which placed the Inspector General in a most awkward position. The brother-in-law of the Inspector General was the lessee of that road.

Mr. SMITH—He was nothing of the kind.

Mr. BROWN said that the gentleman alluded to was the lessee now. The Inspector General held a large proportion of the Debentures of the Company, and was a party to the lease.

Mr. SMITH—No!

Mr. BROWN—Well, he had it assigned to him. And was it to be tolerated that the Inspector General, because he had reasons to favour one particular road, should go and take £10,000 from a special fund, and advance it to this Company on the security of a chattel mortgage?

Six o'clock having arrived, the Speaker left the chair. When the House resumed at half-past seven, Mr. Brown not being in his place to continue his remarks, being at the Railway meeting elsewhere,

Dr. CONNOR said he opposed the Bill on a different ground from that urged by the member for Toronto. Its second clause was without precedence in Canadian legislation, and affected our character as a country the character of our securities, and our best interest abroad. It pushed the company to issue stock which should have a priority over all other loans, charges, and incumbrances whatever. He contended that there could be no principle more avowed, than that no man holding such securities should be deprived of his vested rights by a vote of this House. The Bill should not be read a second time, unless an assurance was given that no bondholder should be robbed of his security. The petition he had presented from Chief Justice Draper against the Bill was not yet printed. He hoped the consideration of the Bill would be put off till Tuesday, till the petition of the Hon. W. H. Draper be printed.

Hon. Mr. CAYLEY wished to make an explanation in reference to the statement of the member for Toronto. He (Mr. Cayley) had not been aware of the terms of the lease. At the time the advance was made to the Cobourg Road, he was a member of the Grand Trunk Board, and was cognizant of all the circumstances. The Inspector General was opposed to making the advance and reluctantly consented to it. And it was a fact that at the time the money was advanced the Government had in its hands £130,000 belonging to the Grand Trunk, a part of the Loan raised under the Relief Act, and £80,000 of which the Company was entitled to have released. The Government were pressed by the Grand Trunk to make the advance, and it was in fact, not the money of the Government, but the money of the Grand Trunk that was advanced.

Mr. W. F. POWELL said that the advance of £13,000 to the Prescott and Ottawa Railroad, which was made on the same grounds as that to the Cobourg and Peterboro' Road was made in August or September, 1856. The hon. Speaker would remember that it was he who conduced the negociations.

Mr. MOWAT said that the explanations by the Inspector General and the Solicitor General did not very well harmonize. The fact was that the advance made, was not from the Grand Trunk funds, but from the marriage license fund. The Inspector General mentioned as a parallel case, the advance of £15,000 out of Uuniversity Funds to the Buffalo Railroad. He (Mr. Mowat) considered that that was a most improper proceedng, and a breach of the law, and that it should not be made a precedent. He considered it was a violation of an important public trust, when the Government took the University funds and applied them to such security as the Railway was able to give.

Hon. Mr. SICOTTE contended that the usage of Parliament was to refrain from discussing the merits of private bills at their second reading.

Mr. BURREAU took the same view, but treated that great care would be taken to preserve the rights of bondholders.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said that the second reading of a private Bill was a matter of course, and he hoped the hon. member for South Oxford would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON said he was himself a bondholder, and was willing that his case should have a full hearing in the Railroad Committee, rather than in the House.

Mr. PATRICK thoug t it a reasonable request to which the Government should accede, that the second reading should be at least delayed till Tuesday, till Mr. Draper's petition was printed.

Hon. Mr. LORANGER and Mr. LABERGE spoke in favour of allowing the second reading, which was always granted as a matter of course to private Bills.

Mr. SHORT said it had been objected to the Bill that it would interfere with vested rights. Hon. members might be relieved from that feeling, for he could state that, unless something was done, these vested rights were worth nothing. He believed it depended very much on some such measure as this being introduced, whether these preferential bonds would be of any value or not.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD said his experience had taught him that unless a Bill was opposed in the House at its second reading, it generally came back from the committee to which it was referred, in the same shape as it was sent to them. The circumstances of this case were very extraordinary. They had had disclosed this evening, what the country never knew before, that £10,000 of the money of the Province had been advanced to this company for the purpose of aiding it in its embarrassed condition.—How were they to know how many appropriations of the same class had been made by the Government to works, in which members supporting them were interested. He was informed that the object of the present Bill was to enable the company to raise £50,000 for the purchase of the three or four miles of the Chemung Road, in which some of those hon. gentlemen were interested. It was said the rights of the bondholders would be protected. He believed it would be impossible to protect them, if the company were allowed to issue as much as £50,000 of preferential stock.

Mr. MACKENZIE complained of the waste of time for which the Government were responsible. Yesterday, because some saint was born or died on the same day a thousand years ago, the House could not sit, although all the ships were open, and members drew their days wages of six dollars for nothing. Last week the Government struggled for twenty-seven hours to get another day for their business, and now when they had a Government day, it was now nearly ten o'clock, and how had they employed it? First they had the St. James' Club Bill, that some five gentlemen in Montreal might eat and drink together, under the authority of an Act of Parliament. The next was the Montreal Boulevard Bill. The Usury Bill and the Bill for the Registration of Votes[illegible] stood but for gentlemen[illegible] a road up the mountain. Now[illegible] the Bill about a Railway[illegible] were discussed[illegible] and the House[illegible] Bill.

Mr. D'Arcy Boulton, but by Mr. Harris. Some delay took place after the application was made, before the Government and the Grand Trunk were satisfied with the securities, and the advance was not made till late in 1856, or the first week or two in 1857. In February 1857, Mr. Boulton became the contractor and lessee, not to pay £10,000 a year at the end of the year but to pay it in advance, and as he was allowed to pay in debentures and not in cash the amount was raised from £9,000 to £10,000. Now, as regarded his (Mr. Cayley's) connection with the lease—when in Montreal he was asked by Mr. Boulton, whom he had assisted to find the means of paying the lease in advance, as Mr. Boulton was not a wealthy man, and because it was thought desirable to keep the lease out of jeopardy, it was assigned to him, (Mr. Cayley.) Since that time, however, it had been handed over to the Grand Trunk in security for their advances. The member for Toronto was very indignant with him for having put his hand into the public chest, to assist this Railway, but where was his indignation when the Government out of a special fund, the Universities Fund, ent £15,000 to the Buffalo and Brantford Railroad. Was the absence of indignation owing to the counties benefitted by that Railroad, such as Haldimand and Brant, were represented in this House by the hon. gentleman's potitical friends? The security in that case also was a chattel mortgage.

Dr. CONNOR—And bonds to the value of twice the amount.

Hon. Mr. CAYLEY—Bonds, which were worthless and were no security at all.

Hon. Mr. MERRITT was of opinion that the second reading should be allowed, with a view to the Bill going before the Railroad Committee. And he entirely differed from the principle laid down by the member for South Oxford, that the issuing of preferential bonds was a fraud. That course was often necessary in order to complete the work and thereby protect the interests of those who had already embarked their money it.

Sol. Gen. ROSE said that at the time the advance was made to the Cobourg road, he was a member of the Grand Trunk board, and was cognizant of all the circumstances. The Inspector General was opposed to making the advance and reluctantly consented to it. And it was a fact that at the time the money was advanced the Government had in its hands £130,000 belonging to the Grand Trunk, a part of the Loan raised under the Relief Act, and £80,000 of which the Company was entitled to have released. it not remarkable fact that a member of the Government should have the assurance to put his hand in the public chest, and privately and secretly give £50,000 to a bankrupt company, handing it over to his own relation, his brother-in-law.

Hon. S. SMITH—Not so.

Mr. MACKENZIE—The Postmaster General knew all about it. Why had he so carefully kept all knowledge of the transactions from the Opposition when he was one of them? It was wonderful how many members were bought over by laying out £10,000 here, and £10,000 there, in that sort of way. And it was for that reason, on account of that corrupt way of wasting the public funds, that the country was in difficulties, and that many people were leaving it.

While calls were being made to bring in the members for a division,

Mr. BROWN entered the House, and begged permission to complete the remarks he was making before the recess. He regretted that he had not heard the explanation given by the Inspector General, in reference to the interest of the Government in the road, and the way in which that £10,000 had been advanced. But he wished to urge upon the attention of the House the extreme danger to the finance interests and the moral interest of the Province, if the Finance Minister of the day, on any plea he choose should be allowed to put his hand into the public chest, and hand over £10,000 to any company he chooses to favour, no matter how good might be the security. Why had the hon. gentleman never stated the fact to the House? Why had he concealed it, so that to this day it did not appear in the Public Accounts? If the Government could traffic in special funds entrusted to their control, it was the most corrupt and corrupting system ever allowed in any free country under the sun Before passing the second reading of the Bill they ought to have the whole of this matter explained, especially when the Inspector General was himself a holder of bonds in the Company.

Hon. Mr. CAYLEY expressed his dissent,

Mr. BROWN asked it it was not the case that the hon. gentleman was a bondholder?

Mr. CAYLEY—Everything you have said has been answered.

Mr. BROWN said, that of course he spoke to a disadvantage, having been absent when the hon. gentleman made his explanation. The whole matter he hoped would be enquired into. He hoped the Inspector General would be brought as a witness before the Committee of Public Account, and asked about all those special funds.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD—That is the proper way.

Mr. BROWN conceived the proper way was for the Government never to put their hands into the public chest without the authority of Parliament; or, if any extraordinary circumstances compelled them to do so, as soon as Parliament met, they should state the facts, and ask an Act of Indemnity. But the Government acted most improperly when they paid this money away, and made no reference to it in the Public Accounts. This was one transaction, and how many more such transactions there had been, who could tell? The Government had £900,000 of these special funds under their control, and if they dealt in this manner with the £10,000 of it, and kept the House in ignorance of the transaction, who could say with how much more of that £900,000 they had trafficked in a similar manner? (Hear, hear.)

Dr. CONNOR, in consequence of the junior member from Toronto (Mr. Robinson), a bondholder of the Company, having expressed his willingness that the discussion of the mode in which the rights of shareholders were affected by the Bill, should be taken in the Railroad Committee rather than in the House, begged to withdraw his amendment.

The Bill was then read a second time, and referred to the Railroad Committee.

REGISTRATION OF VOTES.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD moved that the House go into Committee on the Bill to define the electoral franchise, to provide for the registration of votes, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROWN said the country demanded a measure to amend the election laws, and that a good system of registration should be adopted. He was sure that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would get the assistance of the members on the Opposition benches in passing a measure which would secure the purity of election, and get a fair verdict from the people; but he thought that to this Bill there were serious objections, the chief of which was this—that there would be no good means afforded of determining whether the persons claiming to vote were duly qualified. At present the law on this subject was as faulty as possible. A person came up to the poll and declared that he was a qualified freeholder or occupier. The only check upon him was the oath; but there were many ways in which, by equivocation, the claimant could get his vote recorded, and thus a great amount of perjury was committed. In order to avoid this, the Attorney General had committed the error declaring that every person upon the assessment roll should be entitled to a vote. The assessment roll was only submitted to a scrutiny for assessment purposes, and was not scrutinised for Parliamentary purposes; so that minors and all others who were rated to the requisite amount, would prima facie be entitled to votes.—But beyond this scrutiny, clause 8 provided that if objections were made against any of the persons on the rolls, the Judges of the County Courts of Upper Canada might, after investigation and examination of such rolls, make such alteration and correction of the rolls as they thought proper. The assessment roll was, therefore, the list of electors, and beyond the scrutiny for assessment purposes, there was no revision, except on appeal.

Attorney General MACDONALD said the roll was examined for Parliamentary as well as assessment purposes.

Mr. BROWN said if this were so, it would be well to define what was meant, as that it could not be misteken. The Bill, in its present shape, would lead to universal sufferage, because a large holder of property might divide his property and place a number of persons upon the rate-book in respect to it, and then permit them to give votes which would be fraudulent. It was evident that the assessment rolls must be submitted to a closer scrutiny than that proposed. The Judge's time would be nearly fully occupied in hearing individual appeals against names on the rolls; and the elections might be almost wholly in the hands of these Judges, for there was no day fixed for the notices to be served.

Attorney General MACDONALD said the object of the appeal to the Judges, was to remove petitioners names from the assessment rolls after they had been certified.—They had nothing to do with the original revision.

Mr. BROWN—That the hon. gentleman provides for no sending except that established under the Assessment Act?

Atty Gen. MACDONALD—No.

Mr. BROWN said if this were so, persons might vote fraudulently since they were upon the assessment rolls, instead of being required to have been in possession for six months, according to the election law; and frauds might thus be easily perpetrated.—He desired that the list should be correct as possible, and that the system of scrutiny should be perfect.

Attorney General MACDONALD said there was a great deal of force in the views of the hon. member, and they had weighed a good deal with the Government in preparing the Bill of 1854. But the difficulties connected with obtaining an efficient [illegible] system were so great that, in that Act, no provision was made for it.—The results of the last election, however, had convinced every one that some registration system must be adopted for doing away with the scandals which had prevailed to a lamentable extent. The question then came to be, what system should be adopted? The English system was so exceedingly expensive that it could not be recommended. The [illegible] said that the plan now proposed would be limited as to universal suffrage. He did not think so, even as regards municipal elections, it was very far from universal suffrage, and when they went a step higher, and said that no one rated under £50 should be a Parliamentary voter, it would be still further from universal suffrage. The voter must be an owner or tenant of property worth £50.

Mr. BROWN—No. Must be asserted merely as the owner or occupant. If an encroacher went into a farm-house, where the former had four or five sons, what was to hinder him saying: seven Thomas, for one-fourth, John for one-fourth, and so on.

Attorney General MACDONALD said the assessor was sworn to do his duty, and would know the grounds on which he proceeded before assessing any one. Moreover, any municipal elector was entitled to complain to the Court of Revision, if he knew of any one being assessed too high or too low, or of any one wrongfully inserted on the assessment roll, or wrongfully omitted, and the Court of Revision could decide on such a complaint. This, he thought, got rid of the objection of the hon. member. The system he proposed to introduce, would make the standard higher than that of the municipal elector, and would operate fairly. It was fortunate that the Act would come into operation early in the life of a new Parliament, which it might be presumed, would last for four years. At the distance then of three years from a General Election, the assessor and the Court of Revision, no matter what their political feelings, would have no special interest in getting up a partisan roll.—And three years hence, in the prospect of a General Election, any sudden rush of new names would at once call the attention of the Court of Revision and of all parties interested.

Mr. BROWN asked what was to prevent a man getting a lease for a week, when the assessor was coming round, that he might be put on the assessment roll, and as the Bill made no provision for putting questions, the man might vote long after he had ceased to be an occupant. In the back townships, where there was plenty of wild land, there would be a good deal of fraud of this kind. Provision should also be made for all who chose having access to the assessment roll. He would suggest also that there should be a column for minors, and another for aliens.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said that if there was a scrutiny, and oaths could be put as to how long a man had occupied the property, the evils apparent at the last election would not be abated. All that was necessary was for a man to prove by oath his identity with the name on the roll, and that he was of full age, and a British subject. Having columns for minors and aliens would do no good, as a person who was a minor or an alien when the assessors went round, might have attained his majority or naturalized, when the election came round.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON pointed out a serious defect of the Bill, that it did not provide for the case, which had caused most trouble at the late election, of parties coming in mobs, and by frightening the returning officers from putting the oath, or getting down any number of names. The danger would not be so great as at present, since it was required that the name of every voter should be on the assessment roll, but it was sufficiently great to require some provision to be made for it. The hon. gentleman went on to express himself in favour of giving the system of vote by ballot a trial. He urged also that all the elections throughout the country should take place on the same day, and stated a number of advantages which would result from a change in that respect. He hoped amendments would be inserted in the Bill in Committee, embodying the improvements which he had suggested.

Dr. DORLAND—Under that system then a person owning a farm might divide the lease of it among half a dozen sons, and get them all assessed, and make them voters.

Dr. CONNOR thought there should be one or two protections. The person should have been long enough on the property to have paid taxes. Otherwise they might have such a parties as Martin Cassellman, having 8,000 acres, who might take a number of men and give them nominal assignment of lots, in order to get them on the assignment roll on the eve of an election. Another protection would be the requiring the production of a written certificate, showing a bona fide transfer or leasing of property. He agreed with the member for Montmorenci, that it would be a great improvement to have all the elections throughout the country on one day.—For his own part he would be very happy under the present system to go hand in hand with his hon. friend for Toronto to any constituency where they could exercise a beneficial influence, and he believed they could exert just as much influence as any two gentlemen on the other side. But there was a feeling abroad that the elections were fixed at different times in different localities, to suit best suit the parties in power. It would be an improvement also, if there were several polling places in a township.

Hon. Mr. SICOTTE suggested that these discussions could be conducted with more advantage in Committee. The member for Toronto had suggested some things which it would be very advantageous to incorporate with a Bill, but that could be best done when the particular clauses to which these suggestions applied, came up in succession in the Committee.

Mr. SCRAWOOD thought the Bill could be discussed with great advantage when the Speaker was in the Chair, and went on to suggest some points for the consideration of the House.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD was glad to find that the measure was being proceeded without any partisan feeling. He would suggest that, like the Municipal Act, it should be referred to a Special Committee, after careful consideration of the details, and of the suggestions which had been made in the course of the discussion to-night.

LONDON, Friday, May 21st, 1858.

THE MINISTERIAL CRISIS.

The fate of the Derby Ministry is still doubtful. The debate which commenced this night week in the Commons on the proclamation of Lord Canning, the Governor General of India, and the despatch announcing it from Lord Ellenborough in his capacity as President of the Board of Control, has lasted all the week,—except the day that the House adjourned according to custom to give honorable members an opportunity of going to see or take part in, Epsom Races—is still proceeding, but will probably be concluded to-night. At the beginning of the week it was the almost universal opinion that the Ministry would be defeated when the division came, and probably by a majority of from 60 to 80 votes. Since then, however, there has been a manifest change in the public mind with reference to the main measure of both the administration and their despatch, and it is now thought and predicted that if the Ministry shall be beaten at all it will not be by more than from 20 to 30 majority. Some of the leading Liberals in the House have spoken and will vote for the Government, as for example Mr. John Bright, Mr. J. A. Roebuck, Sir James Graham, Mr. Milner Gibson, and Mr. Charles Gilpin, who are but representatives of many others of Liberal and even Radical tendencies, who will go with Lord Derby in this matter. The Liberal ranks are therefore, clearly divided. But it is said on the other hand that the two sections of Moderates, headed by Lord John Russel and Lord Palmerston have consented to abandon their rival pretensions and unite measure, with a view of course, of being in a position to form a new Ministry in the event of the present resolving to resign. Whether they will do this, however, or dissolve Parliament, is still a riddle which many are trying to solve; but until the division to-night even the key of it is wanting. It will be a thorough trial of strength. Lord Derby has rallied together all his usual supporters in the Commons, who may happen to be absent, and to come home as they value their respectability and love Toryism. Even to Russia and Palestine despatches of this urgent nature have been sent out, with prompt replies of assurance that as fast as cattle or steam can convey them to England they will certainly come. To enable them to arrive is supposed to be one means for delaying the division to the latest possible moment; and another is that as Parliament will not reassemble after its separation to-night for eight clear days, the Ministers, if defeated, will have a little breathing time before being obliged to tell the world what they resolve to do in consequence.

The Earl of Derby had his audience with the Queen yesterday. He is said to be very anxious about his position, but nevertheless, political considerations did not prevent his being at Epsom Races on Wednesday. Yet that day he is said to have completely thrown off the cares of State, and to have entered with zest into the amusements of the time. It was fully expected that his horse, "Pondicherry," would have won the Derby, carrying off the 2,000 sovereign stakes, and the "Blue Ribbon of the Turf," but it did not being beaten by Sir Joseph Hawley's "Beadsman." But to return to the other trials of strength or cleverness, the Daily News of this morning says: "The feeling at the close of the debate last evening, because one of impatience, if not of irritability, and that talk will therefore certainly cease to-night. The Morning Herald the organ of Lord Derby, considers last night's debate was more damaging to the Opposition than previous ones, and refers particularly to the speeches of Sir James Graham and Mr. Bright which were intended to serve the Government. The Times also represents that the fact of Mr. Bright having narrowed the question to the giving up, or the retention of Oude, will considerably aid in uniting it, as he is the man will never consent to retrace their steps in India; and this being understood to be the policy of the Government, the votes of this nation will be heard against them in accents that cannot be mistaken.

Another mail from India has just arrived, but the news it brings is considered to be unsatisfactory than usual, notwithstanding the brilliant feats of arms that were displayed in the capture of Kotah, and the storming of Jhansi. The papers will give you full and interesting details of both of these events. The latter is considered as enough his letter has not yet been published; and the Times gave out yesterday that it had "miscarried." People however are incredulous and say that the Times does not publish it, because it would give the lie to all its India "leaders" of late. The Times of this morning says it is stated that in the papers which will be laid before Parliament to-night, it will be found that Lord Canning omits a draft of the proclamation by Sir James Outram, who is understood to be much averse to harsh measures after successful war—who stood out for the clause that Lord Canning rejected, but added the qualifying clause not in the original; and that Sir James Outram made no further reply. The Marquis of Dalhousie, who brought upon us all this trouble, an unsettled state, by his annexation of Oude, arrived in England yesterday from Calcutta. Major General Inglis of Lucknow has been ordered home on account of illness, and the Archbishop Wilson is on his way thither.

FRANCE.

Whatever the friends of Louis Napoleon may say to the contrary, it becomes manifest more clearly every day that he is losing the confidence and respect of the French people. In spite of all, and the most enormous opposition, two popular candidates avowedly opposed to his oppressive policy, were returned for Paris; and this week Count Migeon, the Opposition candidate has triumphantly defeated the Emperor's nominee, de Chabrol, in the district of Alsace, which was at one time, and not long ago, the strong-hold of Bonapartism. It is observed, too, that there seems like a direct defiance in this, because Count Migeon had only just been liberated from prison for improperly, as it was said, wearing on a particular occasion a trinket of the Legion of Honour. Under the protection of the ballot-box these Alsatian electors were once audacious and safe. The ballot-box is the ark of liberty in France. He who gave the people it, gave them a weapon to beat himself with, and they are beginning to lay it on.

SPAIN.

A new and extensive conspiracy is affirmed to have been discovered in Spain, chiefly in the north east provinces, but no particulars are yet known here.

SARDINIA.

While we are in the midst of a ministerial crisis in England, intelligence has arrived of a similar complication in Sardinia. There, however, the difficulty is financial. The opponents of the Government have taken advantage of the universal antipathy to taxation which is as strong a feeling at the foot of the Alps as on the shores of the German Ocean, and I suppose in Canada, to resist the demands of the Cabinet for an additional loan. Count Cavour has announced to the Chambers that his resignation will accompany his defeat; and there is every probability, at present, that representatives will not persist in the insane attempt to purchase what at best would be a mere postponement of their difficulties, at the expense of no grave a certainty as the loss of a liberal administration.

TURKEY.

The well-wishers of Turkey will be pleased to learn that the defeat of the Sultan's troops by the Montenegrins was the result rather of treachery than of superior conduct or power. Some doubts are also thrown on the duration of the armistice, which has, in the meantime been agreed to; and the Emperor of the French seems to have welcomed the occurrence as one which, by enabling him to take part in the quarrel, may furnish the means of effecting what he cannot but consider a most desirable diversion at present, when his subjects have so many other and more untoward objects of contemplation.

THE LEVIATHAN.

This noble ship is now in full trim, and is to be opened to the public for inspection on Monday.

MONETARY AND COMMERCIAL.

Public attention is now so entirely engrossed in politics as to cause the doing of very little business in the Stock Exchange. Consols have fluctuated a good deal this week, but stand to-day at 97¼. Yesterday and to-day there has been more demand for money. No particular attraction, however, has occurred in the rate, but loans were sought, instead of being offered, at two per cent.

Railway shares are without any new feature. In some descriptions there is increased firmness, but no striking variation can be noted. Grand Trunk of Canada shares are quoted as 49@51—do Bonds 92@93. Great Western 19¼@19¾.—Hide Park Buildings 1¼@1¾.

The French advices cause increased disquiet, both as regards the internal state of the country and the continuous preparations from some external object, and this of course considerably influences the money market and shares.

At a meeting of the Provincial Bank of Ireland, yesterday morning, the report was unanimously adopted, and a dividend declared for the first half of the present year at the rate of 20 per cent per annum. It was stated that while Ireland has been steadily progressing in wealth and tranquil happiness, the prosperity of the Bank has increased in an equal ration. The net profits for 1857 were £116,468, or rather more than in 1856.

The creditors of Mr. R. Browne (R. Browne & Co.) merchant, whose stoppage was announced on the 17th April, have held a meeting, and accepted a composition of 3s. 4d. in the pound.—The liabilities estimated to rank upon the estate are about £32,000, with assets valued at about £9,000.

Seven and sixpence in the pound has also been taken in the case of Mr. H. P. Maplas, commission agent and insurance broker, the negotiations for the sale of his steamers to the Brighton and Western of France Railway Companies having fallen through.

The continental papers announce the final completion of the Hamburg Brazilian Steam Navigation Company.

The Leeds Mercury reports what may possibly be important news to some of your readers. It says:—"It will be recollected that early in November last year Messrs. Nayler, Vickers, & Co., of Sheffield and Liverpool, suspended payment. The creditors, at a meeting held on the 24th of that month, after hearing a statement of the assets and liabilities of the house, the former charging 9 per cent upon over the latter, agreed to accept payment in full in four instalments of 3s. each—the first to be paid on the 15th July next, and the remaining instalments on October 15, 1858, January 15, and April 15, 1859. It appears from a circular issued to the creditors that the house is now in a position to pay in full at the present date—thus anticipating by two months the time when the first payment of the instalment of their liabilities becomes due according to the agreement."

A tasteful taste is manifested in the manufacturing districts, and but few complaints are heard of want of work.

The corn markets generally show a slight tendency to a fall in prices, especially since the heavy and very much needed showers that have fallen this week. But the weather is still cold.

THE ICELAND TORNADO.—The recent great storm in Iceland was no doubt a terrible affair but the papers tell some pretty sharp stories about its freaks. The Penny Transcript, for instance, has the following:—"At Kappa, two cattles were blown away and have not since been heard from. They probably were hoops. At Chance it demolished a house completely, and yet left a bonebeen that was in it, without a scratch or broken piece of glass. It carried a large oil-cover sixty feet and laid it down safe and sound. The next morning after the storm, a man was seen to crawl from under a barn, who on being questioned, stated that as he was coming across the prairie the wind picked him up and carried him half a mile setting him down in front of some four foot deep; he waded out and got on a little run of ground when the wind took him again and buried him with violence against the side of the barn, under which he crawled and spent the night. The most wonderful feat of all, however, occurred at Chance. A farm house was blown at five leagues no less than 200 feet from where it stood, and but down so easily that the children were seated on the floor, with no knowledge of the affair, which was set for supper. A similar occurrence took place at Gilbon where cattle were blown from the side of the house to a height sufficient to allow them being tended by the children from the chamber door immediately each forth on a raft to get the cooking upon the hearthstone."

FRANCE TO THE RESCUE.—Louis Napoleon seems determined to outdo as efficient a protection to the Central American republics against American filibusters, as he established to the Dutchess provinces against Kossuth's filibustering. Mr. Bailey is doing wonders in that quarter of the world. He is lead by an Anti-American contemptible [illegible] about the cities and [illegible] Bailey [illegible] rousing the [illegible] to [illegible] and to [illegible] protection. The New Gold Field.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 6, 1858.

A Gold Fever—Emigration for the British Gold Fields—A new El Dorado—Beaver River Gold Mines!

California is now suffering from a Gold Fever. Nothing is heard but discussions concerning the new discovered auriferous fields in the British possessions north. So great has become the excitement, that the business war, our local political affairs—always the source of considerable acerimony—and the Kansas difficulties, are, for the time being, only questions of secondary importance in the public mind. Already a large emigration has taken place from this State and people are coming from all parts of the interior for the purpose of proceeding to the spots where it is believed fortunes are to be made in a week. During the past month fifteen hundred persons have left here for the new diggings, and although sufficient time has not elapsed to allow reports to be received of their success, yet we have intelligence by two or three steamers weekly from the mines. The newspapers published up there come freighted with wonderful accounts of the riches and extent of the new El Dorado. At first the epidemic was confined to Oregon and Washington Territories but it has spread to California, and the fever is daily becoming greater. On the banks of Fraser river, in the Hudson Bay country, gold has been found in the greatest quantities. Though we are informed the auriferous fields extend to the American side, it is certain the best lie on the British soil. The regions extends from the vicinity of Fort Colville, in Washington Territory, where successful mining operations have been carried on for years, in a north-westerly direction to Fort Thompson, in the british possession, and is principally east of the Cascade range of mountains, and between Fraser river and the western base of the Rocky Mountains. The diggings are located between 48 and 50 degrees north, and 117 and 127 degrees west longitude, covering a space of about 140 square miles.—From the reports that have reached here it is quite likely the mines will equal those of California. Persons who have visited the country say that what this State was in 1848 is just the condition of things on Fraser river It may seem strange that such a rush should take place from here, a gold producing land, to another where so many disadvantages are so certain to encounter the adventurer. It might be inferred our mines are exhausted, and that there is no longer any profitable results following the labours of our miners.—But neither inference would be correct.—Years ago individuals struck claims, and working them in many instances, the fortunate possessor became wealthy. But now things are much changed. The earth still yields the precious metal in abundance, but the principal business is done by incorporations, both foreign and native, and the single adventurer has less prospect of good luck. These companies keep large numbers in their employment, paying five or six dollars a day, and in consequence we have many thousands in our midst who seize with eagerness an opportunity of again entering upon a field where they can have work and receive for their own benefit the result of their labours. The condition of many of our people slightly sketched, will account, in a great measure, for the emigration that has taken place, and which will be vastly increased during the next three months. It is calculated that not less than fifteen thousand people will leave here, and there is ample steamship accommodation, this number is within what will actually leave.—Rich and extensive gold diggings have also been discovered in Carson Valley. Almost the entire population are preparing to leave their occupations there for the mines. Specimens of gold were brought in by exploring parties, which is of good quality and heavy, resembling what is called in California "gulch good."

(From the New York Courier.)

News from Fraser's river, in the British Possessions, confirming the late extraordinary accounts of the gold discoveries has been received. Several steamships, loaded with miners from all parts of the country, have started, and the rush is expected to increase as soon as the news from those who have already left shall be received. The mines extend over a great expanse of country, and are "placer" or surface diggings, similar to those found in the early days of California. They reach across the line into American territory to an unknown distance. Specimens of the gold are exhibited at various places in this city.

FUGITIVE SLAVES.—During the last three weeks more than twenty runaways have passed through this en route for Canada. One of the latest passengers was a Kentuckian, who was so white, in feature as well as colour, that he travelled though Kentucky and crossed the river unsuspected. When he presented himself to the Underground agents of this city, they thought him no runaway, but a white man, and would have continued to regard him as an impostor had not one of his former fellow-bondsmen recognized him. Another of the late fugitives came from Memphis. He secreted himself upon a steamer, and arrived in this city five days afterwards, with out seeing any one. His only subsistence was one biscuit and such drops of water as the paddles, in their revolutions, threw in his hiding place. —Cincinnatti Gazette.

AN ADVENTURE.—A correspondent at Allahabad, who writes on the 8th of April states that a lady, whose name we do not give, of about 16 or 17 years of age arrived at that station on the 7th. Her adventures have been great, and are as follows:—She was at Cawnpore, and went to the boats with the party. She was taken out of them by a sowar of the 3rd Cavalry, with him to Lucknow, then to Ferruckabad, then to Delhi, and after the taking of that city, back again to Lucknow. When Lucknow was taken, he brought her to Synee or Sinnee, a chokee on the Grand Trunk Road, near Allahabad, and left her to make her way into this station. She is in great distress of mind, often in tears, has forgotten much of the English language, and looks prematurely aged.—Delhi Kaunate, April 14.

KANSAS.—A border war again exists in Kansas. The shooting of eleven unarmed Free State men is verified by subsequent reports. Eight of the band of murderers lived in Kansas, and had been expelled by Montgomery's band; The other 19 came from Missouri. 150 armed men Missourians are now beleaguering the obstinate town of Osawatomie, and publish their intention of burning it to the ground. The Governor has gone over under the command of Brigadier General McDaniel.

PORTLAND, Me., June 7.

The Prohibitory Liquor Law, passed by our last Legislature, was resisted by the sale of liquors in this city, having passed by the Supreme Court. The vote in this city for prohibition was 1,500; against it, 1,200. The vote in the State for prohibition was 45,000; against it, 35,000. The Democrats in this city voted against the law, and the Republicans for it.

running a muck against none. By the course I do not despair of seeing an equal and just a spirit finally prevail in the opposition ranks, on Catholic questions, as now exists on most national subjects—such as the Hudson's Bay Territory, the Seat of Government, and the maintenance of the Union. A representative of your interests cherishing such a hope must patiently labor for its accomplishment, for assuredly, it is not to be effected in a day, nor in a single session. But I think I may, with confidence report, that a better spirit than that shown in the general election, has made some progress in the House during the present year—and this, mainly, though not solely among the Opposition. The tone taken towards our religious orders, and the Orange Incorporation bill, are proofs of my assertion.—I am satisfied that a firm and conciliatory conduct is certain to win converts for all our reasonable demands, among the Upper Canada majority, as well as among all classes out of doors.

We have complicated political relations to Upper and Lower Canadian parties.—Our proportion—I speak of Irish Catholics only—is to the French Canadians as one to five, and to "the Lower Canadian British," fully two to one; in Canada West there were in 1851, 167,695 Catholics, of whom all but a mere moity are Irish by origin, though English by speech. On the Provincial population we are, or were at the last Census, somewhere about one-fifth of the whole. Our political distribution makes it impossible, as they found formerly for our British brethren below to act without us, or against us: while our groups of settlers throughout Canada West, and in the cities, often hold the balance between contending candidates.

With our co-religionists of French origin I have all along desired to promote a mutual good understanding. But I will not conceal from you that among a portion of them—I believe a minority—there exists a very determined prejudice against us. Not to mention less known names, Mr. Cartier's insolent declaration in the Montreal Election debate that he "did not want and would not have the Irish," was an exhibition of this spirit not to be forgotten. In old France our kindred in past ages were known and respected as men of high courage and capacity; among the French Canadians of the present day Irish Canadians must make themselves respected, before they can enjoy like consideration. With such able and enlightened men as Messrs. Sicotte, Dorion, D'Salles, Masson, Thibadeau, Langevin, Laberge, and others, on both sides, no such demonstration may be necessary; but with many it is necessary, and its repetition will be called for until we obtain freely our full mode of consideration from our co-religionists of French descent.

Of the disposition of the English population towards us, I have as yet very imperfect information. The protestations of an English man in a colony are always the highest, but this class is not often organized. For the true English character I have, and always had a high respect, as those who remember some of my early Irish speeches, know. In this Province however, I have come more into contact with Scotchmen than Englishmen, and the Scotch are the controlling element, at this hour in Canada West. Some of our friends have a monomania on Scotchmen, and have too often given imprudent expression to that feeling. I never could see the wisdom of making enemies of so numerous and respectable a body; and I have without departing one inch from the line of rigid self respect, endeavoured steadily to diminish that bitter antagonism, and to substitute in its stead a better and friendlier spirit.

For the Protestant Irishman, not an Orangeman, we should feel, and I trust do feel, precisely the same as for one of our own faith. We Catholics of Irish birth or origin, should never forget how much we owe to liberal Protestants of past and present times in our native land. The glory of Grattan should ennoble in our eyes the whole class to which he belonged. Thus would I, on every side, and without compromise, make friends and disarm enemies; thus would I employ that influence with which you have invested me, to strengthen your position and promote harmony throughout society. At present your influence is less than that of the last and least Orange Lodge in the land; in any rival application to Government, the latest offshoot of the Grand Lodge would be certain to bear off the prize from the 400,000 Irish Catholics of United Canada. This should not continue—need not continue another year—if it be not your own choice, if you will not allow yourselves to be degraded and sold through your own "organs." To develope and direct your influence, it is above all things essential that those agents of others should not continue to speak, as if for us, instead of speaking for those who both prompt and pay them. With them no unity is possible, for they are in the service of other masters. Among all honest men unity is highly desirable—as in every way essential—and that it may be had and held, we must endeavour to procure honest organs, who will have no other gain at heart but the good of the whole body.

I have not spoken of that familiar bugbear of the two papers which have assailed me, Mr. George Brown. I hope none of you are very much afraid of Mr. Brown. I never felt that fear, and I do not now.—Mr. Brown has endless energy for business; great earnestness, extensive political information, and indomitable perseverance.—These are qualities which with his youth and constitution, must always make him a power in our politics. But before he can form a new Cabinet which could be re-elected, he must give convincing proofs of a different spirit from the spirit of the Globe during the late election. That spirit never can rule in Canada, and you need not say Amen, have the least apprehension of a Ministry being formed in such an aggressive spirit. To give Mr. Brown his due, we must remember how forcibly he was assailed by organs speaking in your name.—To give him his due, we must treat him like all other public men in the Province, impartially and according to his actions.—This is the rule by which I have been governed, and if without compromise, I would see Mr. Brown back on the old Reform platform, I confess, for your sake, and for peace sake, I would be glad of it.

It seems to me, it is much better to have such a man for a friend, if it can be done, without violation of principle, than for a foe, by a foolish intolerance to wild theorizations of the "Clear Grits." If, however, that cannot be—if Mr. Brown should unfortunately prefer to rally and rely on the antipathies of religion and race, rather than on reason, justice and common sense, it places us and places you in a still better position than we told before, if we show our willingness to welcome any act of liberality from Mr. Brown and his friends, just as if it came from any other man or party; no more and no less.

To conclude: my Political present is a considerable part of my Parliamentary future." The letter of [illegible] was not [illegible] but we see you [illegible] Should [illegible] and nothing remains, but that the same partiality which has [illegible] of former confidence will [illegible] Yours [illegible] of the Union of '41 the real remedy. And I do not believe that, under our system, and on the American Continent, numbers can be steadily ignored, as the prime basis of representation. A revision of our whole constitutional system cannot be far off, and while I would resist, and have already voted against an unequal representation under the present Union Act, I am quite ready to admit, that in any new arrangement, the representation in the popular branch at all events, must be proportioned to population. Abundant constitutional safeguards for the rights of Lower Canada—securing if need be under a Federal pact the autonomy of Lower Canada—can be found; and my humble adhesion to any such arrangement, would mainly depend on the condition of its being sanctioned by the majority of the people of Lower Canada. A change, I believe, must come, and I do not anticipate from it, those frightful consequences which fill the imagination of certain political prophets. I would rather expect, that by rendering the French and Irish more necessary to each other, and the British more just to both, it would on the contrary, tend to hasten the advent of a genuine Canadian Nationality, co-extensive with the country, and enduring as its hills.

Towards the construction of such a Nationality, I would fain hope—if I am to act for you, which is for yourselves to say—I may do something. But that I may do it, I must not be prejudged, counteracted, and calumniated, by persons unwarrantably using your name, but really in the pay of one wing of the party at present in power.

I remain, my friends,
Your faithful and obedient Servant,
THOMAS D'ARCY McGEE.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

JUNE 15.

WOLFORD AND PETERBORO' DEBENTURES.

Hon. Mr. MORRIS moved for a full report of the circumstances attending the issue to the Municipality of the township of Wolford, in the North Riding of Leeds and Grenville, of Municipal Loan Fund Debentures to the amount of £25,000, sterling, and of the return of the same to the Receiver General's Office; and of the subsequent delivery of the said debentures to the Municipality of Peterboro', giving the proper dates and the name of the party by whom the Municipality of Wolford returned the debentures to the Government, and also the name of the person to whom the Government afterwards delivered the said debentures for the Municipality of Peterboro'; and furthermore, whether, within the knowledge of the Government, the Municipality of Peterboro' was subjected to a charge of £1,500, sterling, or of any other sum. The hon. gentleman said the subject which he now brought before the House was one deeply affecting the morals of the community, and was therefore entitled to the grave consideration of the House. The circumstance to which he referred had startled the people in the part of the country where he resided, and would astonish the inhabitants of Peterboro' when they learnt the facts. It proved very clearly that in jobbing and dishonest practices, there was a deeper depth than we had yet reached, and he doubted whether those practices would ever be probed to the bottom and exposed. The facts were these. A railway being in the course of construction between Brockville and Ottawa, the inhabitants of Wolford thought of connecting their township with it by means of a branch road ten miles in length, and they were permitted to take debentures to the amount of £25,000 sterling, with which to build the road. The people of Wolford, however, subsequently changed their minds, and the whole of the debentures were returned. Upon the application of the municipality of Peterboro', the same debentures were ordered to be issued to that body. But did the municipality of Peterboro' receive the full amount of £25,000? They did not; and there rested the dark spot in the transaction. The people of Peterboro' were charged with £25,000, but they only received £23,500. The remainder was pocketed by some other parties, and his object in making the motion was to ascertain who those persons were. It was not probable that one person, the headsman in the matter, was allowed to appropriate so large a sum of money to himself; there must have been others to share the spoil, and justice required that the whole facts should be made public. It was a transaction calling for the most searching enquiry, and the Government, he hoped, would see it to be their duty to give this House the fullest information regarding it. They had been told that "the principle of monarchy is honour;" and if that were so, there was at least one personage in the Province who ought not to allow this matter to pass without instating upon a searching enquiry, and bringing the whole facts before the broad light of day. To deny enquiry, to stifle enquiry, or to turn a deaf ear to the cry of the people for enquiry, would bring a stain on the Vice-regal chair, which the present occupant will never permit. Transactions of this kind had a most demoralizing effect upon the public mind, and the sooner they were discontinued the better it would be for the good name of the country, and the morality of its people. (Hear, hear.)

Hon. Mr. ROSS said, if there had been any jobbing, it must have taken place in that section of the country in which his hon. friend (Mr. Morris) lived. A return respecting these debentures had already been furnished to the other branch of the Legislature, and the Government had no objection to sending down similar papers to this House. Under the Municipal Loan Fund Act passed by the Government of Mr. Hincks, the amount of bonds allowed to be issued by Municipalities was unlimited; but the Government of 1854, restricted the issue to a million and a half, sterling, for each section of the Province. At the time the people of Peterboro' applied to the Government for debentures, the amount issued under the Municipal Loan Fund Act was absorbed, and an arrangement was made that the debentures about to be returned by the Municipality of Wolford should be surrendered to the Peterboro' municipality, and for that amount the latter body were debited in the Receiver General's office. The Government knew of no deduction having been made in the course of the transfer; but it had been said that a Mr. Whitcomb had received a per centage on the transaction, and the first time they heard of such commission being exacted was the other day, when it appeared in the newspapers.

Hon. Col. FERRIER said the first sentiment just uttered by his hon. friend, "the principle of monarchy is honour," came from Sir Francis Bond Head, upon whom the hon. and gallant gentleman pronounced a warm eulogy.

Hon. Col. TACHE called the date of the [illegible]

[illegible] Government, he [illegible] say one [illegible] that he took a farthing more than the salary due to him. (Hear, hear.)

The motion was then agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF RECORDERS.

Mr. CARTIER moved the third reading of the bill to give increased jurisdiction to Recorders &c.

Mr. DORION moved in amendment that no one should be tried under the bill unless he consented to forgo trial by jury.

Mr. CARTIER stated that he had determined to make the law apply only to people who kept houses of ill fame, and to strangers in the province—sailors at Quebec and Montreal

Mr. BROWN thought it a most serious thing to subject strangers to be tried by a single person or by two magistrates.

Mr. FOLEY asked why, if the bill was to apply only to sailors, it should not be said so at once. The government were always inviting strangers to come to the country, either as sailors or emigrants, either to stay or to pass through, and he could not see why they should be deprived of the right to a jury. Such a difference between the resident and the stranger was not be believed known even in Russia. Stranger were those who above all others ought to be protected, and if a person were to come to Canada from New York, and to get into any difficulty, or if he were entraped into any difficulty, it would be very hard for him to be called up and punished by a magistrate with six month's imprisonment and a fine of £25.

Mr. BELLINGHAM held that this first step to destroy the trial by jury was very dangerous, and that while every other nation was progressing, Canada should not retrograde. The law might have been done away with to a certain extent in England; but the magistrates there were of a different class from those of this country.

Major CAMPBELL felt that the bill gave too great power to country magistrates; but he did not think there was any great objection to it in towns where there was a Recorder, who was a professional man.

Mr. CARTIER said that persons could refuse to be tried by magistrates if they pleased.

Major CAMPBELL—Not strangers.

Mr. CARTIER had no objection to amend the bill so as to make it apply only to the towns.

Mr. DUNKIN remarked that if the amendment just proposed did not pass, he would move another amendment to the effect that the bill should apply only to keepers of disorderly houses, and to seafaring people.

Mr. MCGEE thought the bill might be very hard upon Americans coming to the country to spend their holiday, and perhaps spending it more jollily than prudence would justify. Such persons were peculiarly liable to get into scrapes, and to be entrapped. It would be too bad if some of these persons were to be deprived of their right to a jury, and he thought so to deprive them might injure the hotel keepers, carters, &c., who now made so much by these strangers. So with sailors they might, with such a law, have strong objections to come to the Port of Quebec.

Mr. ALLEYN explained that sailors, for the sake of getting away from their ships, sometimes got up rows in order that they might be bound over for trial till the ship went away.

Mr. PICHE complained that there was no appeal given in this bill to persons to be tried by these magistrates. In the Black acts, an appeal was given from convictions on simple assault, for sums of $20. Now here was punishment amounting to fine of £25 and six month's imprisonment, given to two magistrates without appeal. It is said there would be an option to the accused, but many persons might know nothing of the magistrates, and might not be in a condition to await a trial by jury, yet they might find themselves subjected to great injustice, and why should they not have an appeal, which was at their own expense?

Mr. MOWATT thought that the simple way of meeting the difficulties which this bill was intended to obviate, was to do as they did in Michigan, and be content in other States.

Hon. Mr. SICOTTE said that he was really at a loss to understand the objection by members of the Opposition. The Government declared they would limit the exemption from the benifit of trial by jury to the sailor and the prostitute, and this being the case, he was not posted up as to the reason of the indignation manifested. The hon. member who last spoke said he would be disposed to coincide with the Government if they could make out a case sufficient to justify the proposed course. He (Mr. Sicotte) would leave the prostitutes alone, he did not suppose there was any member in the House that would support their case. The only case worth discussing was that of the sailor. If the hon. gentleman who had asked that a case should be made out, had paid any attention to the opinions of gentlemen who came from the district of Quebec, he would have seen that they were in favour of summary action against sailors. It was well known nothing had tended so much to injure the shipping interest as the difficulty of forcing the sailors to keep their engagement and remain faithful to the ships they were bound to man, not only when they came to port, but when they returned. He had seen it stated that 107 fewer vessels had visited Quebec this year than last. Sometimes it had been necessary to send to New York to procure sailors. The bill of the Attorney General East was to prevent this, to give summary power to the Recorder for jurisdiction in cases where sailors were concerned.

Mr. DORION asked what was the number of sailors who had been tried by jury in any given year?

Mr. DUBORD said he did not think they were more than five in number.

Hon. Mr. SICOTTE argued that when the ship went away, and the trial came on, the sailors were not to be found. This fact proved the case, for which the hon. member for South Ontario had asked; it was a proof that the object of the law was not attained. The course proposed by the hon. Attorney General East, was followed in English ports, and in New York, so that we had the example of two countries before us, in both of which trial by jury was looked upon as a bulwark of liberty, in which the exception proposed by the Bill was made.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER said the hon. member for South Ontario challenged the Government to make out a case. He would read an official report from the Superintendent of Police at Quebec. This the hon. gentleman did, from which appeared that the sailors, in order to get out of an engagement, would sometimes commit assaults upon one another. They were then taken before a magistrate, and bound over to appear at the Assizes. They easily procured bail, and when the trial came on, neither counsel nor witnesses were to be found, as they had sailed from the port at an unexpected rate of wages.

Mr. LABERGE argued that if it was expedient to provide for a case like this, why was not a like course to be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

...ages of schools and colleges. Men who wish to be really educated must study for themselves. The bill of knowledge can not be climbed by deputy. Mark the difference in securing an education between the rich man's son and the poor man's son, is less than is generally supposed. In truth, the self reliance which limited circumstances give to a lad, may almost be considered to counterbalance the advantages which misfortune bestows. It is a striking fact in confirmation of this, that most of our great men have been poor. Young men should think of this.

Mr. Sicotte's Land Regulations.

The Bill of the honourable Mr. Sicotte, concerning the future arrangement of the Crown Land Department, and management of the sales of public lands, will, if it becomes law, produce great changes in the system hither to pursued, and, since a large tract of unreclaimed country is being opened up for settlement in our rear, it occurs to us that a review of the Bill would be as interesting a topic as we could this week present to our subscribers. No reasons are given in the preamble, as necessitating the change, and the Act proceeds at once to describe the new department, as it is itself constituted, and in what manner it will deal with the unsold land of the province. First, the land department will consolidate the management of all the public lands, whether heretofore known as Crown, Clergy, School, Ordnance, Indian, or Jesuit's Estate. The head of the department to be called the Commissioner of Public Lands, and to have an Assistant Commissioner, who shall attend to the financial part of the office, and be capable of acting in the stead of his chief during the absence of the Commissioner. He shall have two officers, to be called clerks of land claims, one for Upper Canada, and the other for Lower Canada, whose principal duty will be to examine and report on claims and differences relative to the purchase of any of the public lands. The Commissioner shall appoint an officer to be called the Surveyor General, whose duty shall be to superintend the making of surveys, and all matters relating thereto under the directions of the Commissioner. The former powers vested in the Surveyor General to be vested in the Commissioner of Public Lands. There shall be another officer, denominated the Recorder of the Land Department, whose duty it will be to attend to the engrossing, recording and transmitting of patents, he also to be appointed by the Commissioner. A report of the affairs of the Land Department to be transmitted, in the beginning of each year, to the Secretary of the Province, for the use of the members of the Legislature. Twice a year a list of the public lands for sale to be made out, and advertised in a manner to give general information. The Commissioner shall have power to appoint agents for the sale of public lands, and for the granting of licenses to cut timber thereon, who shall give sufficient security for the performance of their duty. They shall enter on books kept for the special purpose, and on which no blank leaves or space shall be left between the different entries, the application of every person who may apply for the purchase of any of the lands in his agency, stating carefully, in each entry, the date of the application, the date of any receipt by him given, and the amount of money specified in the receipt, and the number of the lot, concession, and name of township. If two or more persons apply at the same time for the same land, the Agent shall immediately determine by lot, in presence of the parties, which of them shall have preference. No agent for the sale of public lands shall purchase any land which he is appointed to sell, under penalty of forfeiture of office, and avoidance of the sale. No person appointed to an office created by this Act, or employed in the Land Department, shall directly or indirectly be concerned in the purchase of any right, title, or interest, in any public land, nor take any fee for transacting the business of his office, under the penalty of forfeiture of his office, and one thousand dollars, half the fine to be paid to the party informing, the other half to the Receiver General, and if not paid, then the defaulter to be committed to the common gaol, for a period of not less than two nor more than five years.

If any land agent shall knowingly and falsely inform any person applying to him to locate or purchase any land within his division and agency, that the same has been already located, assigned or purchased, or shall refuse to permit the person so applying, to purchase the same, such agent shall be liable therefor to the person so applying, in the sum of forty dollars for each acre of land within the person so applying offered to locate or purchase, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of record having jurisdiction of the amount. The system of free grants is to be entirely obliterated, except in cases of settlement on a new [illegible] Land Agent in Council may make such grants subject to conditions. Persons who are now in occupation, without having purchased, the same of the lots of concessions in all townships of each bill, containing not exceeding fifty acres each, [illegible] the Land Agent, before the 1st day of July next after the passing of this Act, [illegible] the lowest price fixed for the lands in that Agency. In townships where no settlement duties are demanded, an upset price, according to its value, shall be set on each lot, and all lots, remaining unsold, shall be offered at public auction, for what they will bring, in June and in October, in every year. The Act is a good one, and recommends itself to the country, though of course there are points which admit of different opinions, but these are not important.

The £1,500 Sterling.

The Town Council has resolved that communication shall be held with some chancery authority in Toronto, respecting the abstraction of the £1,500, sterling, in debentures. This is all right, provided the matter is undertaken in earnest, but if there is any vacillation or misplaced sympathy, was betide the unhappy medium. We have no great faith in the sternness of municipal bodies, they are apt to be turned away in their wrath, since they can do so with small cost to themselves. If, however, it is to be undertaken, let all correspondence between the municipality and the gentleman employed be in writing; let it not be left to any one to make it his own case, to manage as he pleases, lest, being one, he make a good fellow of himself, by a laxity, which, before being shown, ought to have the consent of every ratepayer. Will the Review, who undertakes to exculpate Mr. Conger, ascertain what Mr. Conger meant, when in his letter assigning the reason of the town of Peterborough having to submit to a sacrifice of £1,500 sterling, to be, that there was that amount of back interest which the Government were not willing to lose! We should be very glad to see Mr. Conger recover his position before this community, but before assisting him, we must have some explanations such as the above, and, next, why it is that, pretending to have a receipt for the money, properly paid of course, for without that a receipt will avail him nothing, he refuses to deliver it up on the demand of the Council?

Oh! The Heat.

Now that the hot weather has fairly set in, and people are anxiously exclaiming against its oppressiveness, a day's pleasure taking on the cool waters of Pigeon Lake is anything but disagreeable. To accommodate the public in this respect, the steamer "Fly," which took away the prize, at the late inspection of the steamers on the back lakes, especially in the quality of her boiler, which, as every body knows, is the great point of safety to be ascertained, is now put on the route between Mud Lake and Bobcaygeon, and will give to families the advantage of a cheap sail for the day, whereby they will be better able to sustain the heat on land for a week. Every family should avail itself of the opportunity, it is cheaper and more effective than the medicine chest, besides being a perfectly charming excursion.

Arrival of the "Persia."

ST. JOHN'S N. F., June 21.

The Royal mail steamship Persia, Captain Judkins, From Liverpool on Saturday the 12th instant, was boarded off Cape Race at 8 o'clock Saturday evening, by the steamer Victoria, the newly employed news yacht of the associated press. The Persia has 128 passengers for New York.

The news is quite interesting as will be seen from the subjoined summary of its points.

The Agamemnon left Plymouth Sound at nine o'clock on the 10th. The Niagara left under steam at eleven o'clock. The squadron subsequently started under canvas with a northerly breeze.

The Government will despatch a steamer to Trinity Bay, to pilot the Niagara, as near as practicable to the point where it is decided to land the cable. The Niagara will be expected momentarily, on and after next week, but from the fact that the fleet would use no steam on reaching the middle of the Atlantic, it is quite possible that the Niagara will not reach this coast before the 1st of July. This office has been placed in communication with the office at Trinity Bay, and it is understood that the Telegraph Company will place their wires hence to New York at the service of the press and the public, for the transmission of such communications connected with the great event, as may be handed in for a few days subsequent to the arrival of the Niagara.

A new weekly line of steamers, of which the Indian Empire, formerly the United States, as the pioneer, was ready for operation. The Indian Empire with the Colonial and United States Mails would leave Galway for Halifax and New York on Friday. She is expected to run from Galway to Halifax in eight days.

The terms upon which the Cagliari affair has been settled are as follows:—Naples agrees to compensate the English engineers with £3,000 to place the Cagliari at the disposal of Queen Victoria, and to liberate the Sardinian prisoners forthwith. The warlike preparations going on in France attract the attention of the English Parliament.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Disraeli repudiated all idea of the danger of a war with France, and said the relations of the two powers were of the most amicable nature. Mr. Fitzgerald had stated in the House of Commons that Mr. Mason, the American Minister at Paris, laboured under grave misapprehensions in representing England as acquiescing in the free labour movement.

LIVERPOOL MARKETS.

SATURDAY, June 12.

CORTON MARKET.—Cotton had declined 1 to ½ in favor purchasers, and [illegible] and moderate demand. The sales of Friday, the 11th inst., were 7,000 bales, the market closing dull with the following quotations. Fair Orleans at 7½d. Stock in port was estimated at 633,000 bales, of which 582,000 bales were American. The address from the manufacturing districts also unfavourable. At Manchester there was but little enquiry for good and prices were weak."

LIVERPOOL BREADSTUFFS MARKET.—The market for breadstuffs was dull but generally steady. Richardson, Spence & Co., report the weather favourable for the growing crops. Flour and yellow western canal, 20s to 21s; Philadelphia and Baltimore, 21s to 21s 6d; Ohio, 20s 6d to 23s. Wheat dull at the decline of Tuesday, reported per steamer Vanderbilt; red western, 7s 6d to 7s 7d; southern white, 7s to 7s 2d. Corn quiet; yellow 34s 3d to 34s 9d; white, 32s to 32s 6d.

LIVERPOOL PROVISION MARKET.—The Liverpool Provision market was generally dull. Beef quiet but steady; holders offered freely, but showed no disposition to press sales. Pork firm at quotations.—Bacon was also firm. Lard dull at 56s, an extreme price in retail. Tallow was nominal.

LONDON MARKETS.

The circulars of Messrs. Baring Brothers report breadstuffs tending downwards. Wheat 1s to 2s lower. Iron steady at 150s for both scale and bars. Sugar firm. Coffee steady. Rice firm. In American securities the market was dull, and sales unimportant.

The London money Market was without change. Consols in the street closed at 95¾ to 96 for account. The bullion in the Bank of England had decreased £123,000.

The Mormons.

WASHINGTON, June 22.

Sufficient intelligence has been received to leave no doubt that Captain Marcy's command has reached Camp Scott in safety. It was the intention of Governor Cumming when last heard from to proceed at once to open a trade with the valley.—Many of the Mormons were understood to own more cattle than they were desirous of carrying away, and of which they were anxious to dispose. The safety and general welfare of the troops at Camp Scott and elsewhere between that post and the United States, may be reckoned upon with confidence. The Mormon troops had been entirely withdrawn from the approaches to Salt Lake, though the people threatened to return if the army advanced before they reaped and carried off the wheat harvest. Governor Cumming says that it may be regarded as safe for emigrants from the United States to proceed to California, via Salt Lake, the road being entirely open.

☞ The passengers on the down train on the Northern Railroad had an exceedingly narrow escape yesterday morning. The Mad River Bridge near Sunnidale was discovered to be on fire about 7 30, and the train was due at that place about that hour. The bridge was so far consumed that the train in attempting to pass over it would have been precipitated into the river beneath. Fortunately a man named Cote, discovered the fire, and succeeded in stopping the train some fifty yards before it reached, what would have been otherwise a fatal chasm. Beyond the destruction of the bridge no harm was done. By the quick despatch of Mr. Harvey, the conductor, the passengers were safely conveyed across and came down in the upward train. Workmen were immediately sent up, and by six o'clock last night the damage was repaired and the trains passed over safely. The fire was supposed to be the work of an incendiary.—Toronto Globe.

The truth has not hitherto leaked out as to some remarkable dealings which took place a few days ago between the East Indian Company Directors and Lord Ellenborough; and we shall tell what we have good reason to think that we accurately know.

In entire ignorance of the secret despatch—of which its authors had not then become so enamoured as to plot its publicity—the directors had written another and public despatch, of whose tenor we only learn that it was inconsistent with that of the document prepared by Lord Ellenborough. This despatch was sent to Lord Ellenborough for his approval, and returned by him as approved, but without one word as to his having written another despatch overriding the public one—the members of the secret Committee of the Directors, through whose hands the secret despatch had passed, being of course restrained by their oaths and compelled to act as if they new no more than their colleagues. This public despatch was therefore compelled to go out by the mail of Monday last. But on Thursday and Friday preceding, came out the secret despatch and its history, and it became expedient to prevent if possible the two clashing despatches, going out to India in company. Accordingly, Sir Frederick Currie, the present chairman of the Company, who had been Lord Ellenborough's secretary in India, and is one of the Directors nominated by the Government, along with Sir James Hogg, who has been for some time past Lord Ellenborough's very obsequious friend, called a special meeting of the court to be held on Monday before the despatch of the Mail for the purpose of cancelling the despatch previously agreed by the Directors and approved of by the Minister. But the Directors were found obstinate in their belief that they ought to do what they thought wrong and unjust merely because Lord Ellenborough was already in his ship and had acted with duplicity. They therefore rejected Sir F. Currie's proposal, and not only so, but took the opportunity of passing a vote of confidence in Lord Canning, in resisting which Lord Ellenborough's two commissaries could muster only one vote (Captain Eastwick, we believe), in addition to their own two. The result was of course the opposite of what was intended—Lord Ellenborough wanted the directors virtually to sanction his despatch by cancelling their [illegible] but they [illegible] stand, but voted another, which amounted to an indirect censure on him. It was then urged—with the view, of course, of rendering the vote of confidence too late for this days mail—that the resolution adopted could not be sent out without the approval of the Board of Control; but the Court resolved to take upon itself the responsibility of the statement that [illegible] that they blame and mistrust nobody as they did, go out together. A triumph certainly followed—The [illegible] of this vessel Lord Ellenborough [illegible] to cancel his [illegible] by [illegible] to send out [illegible] in the Calcutta [illegible] and [illegible] Board, as only at the last moment the requisite signature

Royal Artillery Operations!

Young Artillerymen America is ashamed. Her fleets [illegible] of war [illegible] by. British fleets of war [illegible] audacity to take American slavers, and search the holds whose shackled and chained human freight festers and rots in the stench of unclean[illegible] and stagnated air.

But it is a noble opportunity for plucky beardless lieutenants to show their bravery and ornaments to war clothes at the wrongs of their country! The following letter is edifying in this connection, as showing how much real cause of complaint exists:—

To the Editor of the Tribune.

SIR,—I saw a report in your paper of the 22nd of May, that the ship Echo and Albert, bound from Guantanamo New Orleans, was fired into by a British cruiser.

Now, Sir, I beg leave to inform you that I sailed from Genoa to New Orleans in the ship Echo and Albert and was much surprised to see such a report, as (I am positive that no such thing ever occurred, nor do I believe that we saw a British cruiser on the voyage. I also wish to say that if we were not better protected by the British cruisers than we are by our [illegible] we [illegible] for any merchant vessel to cross the Atlantic, for piracy could be carried on with impunity.

Cracking Nuts.

SIR,—The subjoined and rather boastful paragraph has been going the round of the papers without exciting any correcting observations:—

"A NEW ONE UPON CANADA.—Why was the "beautiful," "commodious" and "superbly furnished" steamer Canada withdrawn from the waters of Lower Canada and taken to the docks of Lower Canada? Yes, what boast about the trade of Upper Canada, answer why the Lower Canadians have to come to the rescue of an unfortunate steamboat property, whose vessels lay for two years rotting at the Hamilton wharf, and the Canada to be sent [illegible] too! A second nut to crack.—Dundas Warder."

I do not think either of the above "nuts" very hard to crack—indeed they appear to belong to the "soft-shell" fraternity. But let me ask, did it never occur to the learned Editor of the Warder that there is a lack of first-class steamboats on the waters of Lower Canada, and that the magnificent steamers Canada and Anglo-Saxon, are simply going down to supply that want, in short, are going to the rescue of our Lower Canada friends? This is a fact of which he might have informed himself had he taken the trouble necessary to do so, and had he not been too ready to bestow an undeserved compliment on our neighbours. And it might also have occurred to the gentleman who makes the "soft impeachment" against Upper Canada, that railroad accommodation amongst us has become so extensive and wide-spread, that it has superceded the old necessity of the employment of a great number of steamboats. And with regard to the commercial transactions of this section of the Province, he could have had his memory amply refreshed by a careful perusal of the Report showing the state of our trade, and where he can see, all things considered, that the condition and prospects of Upper Canada are proportionately equal to those of any other country.

Deeming these statements a sufficient refutation of the paragraph above quoted, I will now very briefly point out the source where I believe all the misapprehension on this subject has arisen, and in order to do so I beg the liberty of introducing an unpublished anecdote for the purpose of illustration, and having spoken of "soft impeachments" and the like, it will be found appropos, and with the relation of this incident I will close this communication:—

A gentleman was one evening traversing, with a young lady, the banks of the beautiful St. Lawrence river, when, in a sudden gallant mood he laid his hand on her shoulder (low-necked dresses then being the fashion) and complimented her on its beauty and alabaster delicateness. Knowing this flattery to be unmerited, the lady, looking up into his face and with an arch smile playing about her mouth replied, "But, sir, I can put your hand on a softer place than that." The gentleman was confounded, he blushed, stammered, and stumbled, but finally recovering himself requested the fair one to tell him where this "soft spot" was. She consented, and said—"if you will allow me your hand I will conduct it to the spot," and then suiting the motion to the word she raised his hand and, placed it on his own head!

The application is easy.

TORONTO, June 21.

The market on Saturday was well supplied with produce and with a good attendance of farmers and dealers. There was a [illegible] the day. Prices generally remain unchanged, and there is a good demand for all [illegible] products.

WHEAT.—The deliveries of wheat amounted to 2,000 bushels, the average sample of which was rather above the ordinary. Prices had a wide range, extending from 4s to 5s, the current rates for good samples ranging from 4s 9d to 4s 10d; [illegible] for the day, to almost at 4s 6d; in only one or two instances 5s was paid.

FLOUR.—There continues to be an active enquiry for flour for shipment and for consumption. Although we are hardly justified in advancing our quotations yet the firmness of holders and the scarcity of buyers to secure good lots impart buoyancy to the market and give prices an upward tendency [illegible] quote superfine $3 65 a $3 75; fancy $3 80 a $3 90; extra $4 10 a $4 25 per barrel.

OATS.—Still more scarce, and prices are very high [illegible] 2s to 2s 3d per bush.

THE MORMONS IN ARMS.

St. Louis, June 9.

A despatch from Leavenworth of the 1st inst. says that intelligence from Camp Scott to the 16th of May, had been received at the fort. On that day, two Mormons from the City came into the camp, bearing despatches from Governor Cummings for Secretary Cass. The troops anticipated to move towards the valley by the end of May. Nothing was known at the Camp of the proceedings within the City. The despatches came by mail to the fort. The communication was brought in supplies the following provisions to the 16th Leonardo on the 10th. At Kearney, the commanding officer directed him to inform Col. Monroe that he had information that Governor Cummings had been expelled from Salt Lake City, and that the Mormons were in arms and determined to resist the troops to the last, and requesting Col. Monroe to push on as speedily as possible. This information was received at Kearney through a mail brought by the messenger, to which it was communicated verbally for fear of them. Col. Hoffman's command was met seventy-five miles west from Laramie. He had encountered snow three feet deep, and lost many animals. All the streams were very high. The peace commissioners had passed Fort Laramie and were obliged to swim the Platte, at the latter post. It was reported that the troops at Camp Scott were living on mule meat. No official intelligence was received at the fort, but the authority for the foregoing was considered unquestionable.

The Committee on Public Accounts.

WEDNESDAY, June 23.

The Committee met at eleven o'clock,—Mr. Hogan in the Chair.

Mr. CONOLLY was the first witness called.

By Mr. BROWN.

Q.—Were you a representative of Peterboro' during last Parliament, and were you a candidate for re-election at the last general election? A.—I was.

Q.—Did you immediately preceding the general election negociate a Loan of £25,000 from the Municipal Consolidated Loan Fund for the Town of Peterboro'? A.—Sometime in the month of October I made arrangement with a person holding Debentures to the amount of £25,000 to surrender them, and on application to the Government they consented to take the town of Peterboro' Debentures in lieu of those of the township of Wolford.

Q.—Who was the person who held the Debentures? A.—The person who brought the Debentures to me was Mr. E. H. Whitmarsh, the Reeve of Wolford.

Q.—Did Mr. Whitmarsh hold the Debentures as his own property, or as Reeve of the Township of Wolford? A.—I cannot say.

Q.—What was the nature of your bargain with Mr. Whitmarsh? A.—My bargain with Mr. Whitmarsh was, that if he surrendered the Debentures to me, free of all incumbrance, he would get the proceeds of three Debentures equal to £1,500 sterling.

Q.—Before closing this transaction, had you any communication with the Government as to the operation? A.—The Government were not aware of the transaction to my knowledge, until three days before the Debentures were handed over to me. An application was then made to the Executive Council to consent to the transfer, and in my petition to them I was obliged to state the name of the Municipality.—They knew nothing, that I am aware of, respecting the nature of the arrangement.

Q.—Do you mean to say that you concluded the agreement with Mr. Whitmarsh without having had the consent of the Government to the exchange of the Peterboro' for Wolford Debentures? A.—I do mean to say that they knew nothing about it.

Q.—Did you not say a moment ago that you had obtained the consent of Government to an exchange of Debentures for the Town of Peterboro', but without naming Wolford as the township? A.—The Government were not applied to until five or six weeks after the arrangement had been made with Mr. Whitmarsh.

Q.—Was it before the Debentures of Wolford were handed over to you by Mr. Whitmarsh? A.—It was. The Debentures were not surrendered until after the Executive Council had sanctioned the exchange. The reason why they were not transferred before was, that I would not allow Mr. Whitmarsh to surrender until I had obtained the sanction of the Executive Council.

Q.—If the Government had not given their sanction to the exchange, would not the transaction between you and Mr. Whitmarsh have fallen through? A.—It would have fallen through so far as I was concerned.

Q.—To what member of the Government did you explain the change of Debentures you desired to effect? A.—I think I spoke to the Inspector General at one time and asked him whether there would be any objections to make the proposed exchange. I made no explanation to Mr. Cayley as to the nature of the exchange.

Q.—What reply did the Inspector General make to your proposal? The Inspector General said if the securities offered were equal to the securities held, he did not conceive there would be any objection.

Q.—Did he not ask the name of the township for which the Debentures had been issued? A.—He did not.

Q.—Did he ask whether the Debentures had been regularly passed away by the township, or if you obtained them direct from the township? A.—He asked me no questions of that kind that I recollect.

Q.—What is the date of your memorial to the Government, and have you a copy of it? A.—I kept no copy. I think it was dated the 25th or 26th of November.

Q.—How soon after presenting did you receive an answer? A.—I think in about 48 hours afterwards.

Q.—How soon afterwards were the new Debentures issued? A.—The new Debentures were issued on the 26th of November, the day after the surrender of the old ones.

Q.—How soon after getting the answer to the memorial did you surrender the Debentures? A.—They were surrendered within two or three days afterwards.

Q.—Did you obtain the consent of the people of Peterboro' before you concluded the transaction with Mr. Whitmarsh. A.—I did.

Q.—In what manner did you do so and at what date? A.—The first intimation given them was on the 13th October, when the By-Law was introduced in the Town Council, and they heard of it again when the By-Law was passed.

Q.—Did you tell them that you had agreed to pay Mr. Whitmarsh £1,500 sterling on the transaction? and did you say that the money was to go to Mr. Whitmarsh personally, or to the township of Wolford? A.—I stated that the Debentures would only be had on the payment of that sum; but they did not know the name of the party with whom I was dealing.

Q.—Why did you conceal from them the name of the party with whom you were dealing? A.—Because I did not desire any other party should have an opportunity of stepping in and obtaining the Debentures.

Q.—In your negotiations with Mr. Whitmarsh, did he represent himself as acting for himself or the township? A.—Mr. Whitmarsh, as I before stated, did not represent himself as acting for the municipality, but merely as holder of the Debentures.

Q.—Was the by-law of Peterboro' regularly passed and approved by the Attorney General before the new debentures were issued? A.—He did not.

Q.—Did you have that by-law passed, and all these proceedings taken without having ascertained from any member of the Government that the exchange would be sanctioned? A.—No. I had a conversation with Mr. Cayley and other members of the Government, who gave me an assurance that if the securities were equal, there was a probability that the exchange would be allowed.

Q.—To whom were the new Debentures of the town of Peterboro' delivered by the Receiver General? What was done with them? How and by whom was Mr. Whitmarsh settled with? A.—The new Debentures were delivered to me by the Receiver General, and after paying Mr. Whitmarsh as agreed, the remaining cash and debentures were handed over to the treasurer of Peterboro'. While waiting for the sanction of the by-law, I had been endeavouring to dispose of some of the Debentures, and I succeeded of disposing of four, each of £500 sterling.

Q.—For what sum did you sell these four Debentures of £500 sterling each?—And how did you dispose of the proceeds? A.—The Debentures were, I think, sold at eight per cent. discount. The proceeds of three of those debentures were handed to Mr. Whitmarsh. The proceeds of the other with the remaining Debentures were handed over to the treasurer of the town of Peterboro'.

Q.—Is it or is it not the fact that the Debentures you thus bought were the property of the township of Wolford—that Mr. Whitmarsh merely held them as Reeve of the Township—and that he had no consent of the Township to sell them to you? A.—I know nothing about that. All I know is, that when he surrendered the debentures he exhibited to me an order or resolution from the Council of Wolford, authorizing him to surrender them.

Q.—Then did you not know from that fact that the Debentures were the property of the town of Wolford. A.—I did not know how Mr. Whitmarsh became possessed of them, not having had any communication with the municipality of Wolford.

Q.—But from the fact of the surrender and the relieving of the township from all responsibility, must you not have known that no use had been made of the Debentures by the township, and that they were still the property of the township? A—I cannot say as to that.

Q.—Do you know how Mr. Whitmarsh applied the £1,500 sterling paid him by you? A.—I do not.

Q.—Did you receive any part of the money, or any consideration in lieu thereof? A.—I did not.

Q.—Has the township of Wolford taken any action on this transaction? A.—I do not know.

Q.—Has the town of Peterboro'? A.—not that I am aware of.

By Mr. CAYLEY.

Q.—In what capacity did Mr. Whitmarsh hold the Debentures of the township of Wolford? A.—I do not know. He never represented himself to me as being the agent of the township of Wolford.

Q.—How did you know he held the Debentures? A.—I was making enquiries at the time, and in a conversation I had with him, he informed me he knew where £25,000 of Debentures were to be had.

Q.—In what capacity did you apply for the transfer of the Debentures to yourself—as agent for the municipality of Peterboro', or otherwise? A.—As agent for the town of Peterboro'.

Q.—Was the municipality of Peterboro' a consenting party to the arrangement? A—It was.

Q.—How many months elapsed after the issue of the Debentures before they were transferred to the township of Peterboro'—and were they charged with interest at the rate of eight per cent. from the date of their issue? A.—About eighteen months; and they were charged with eight per cent. from the date of issue.

Q.—Did the arrangement made between you and Mr. Whitmarsh, that the Debentures should be free of all incumbrance, throw upon Mr. Whitmarsh the payment of all interest to the date of the transfer? A.—Certainly. The understanding was that the municipality of Peterboro' was not to be liable for interest prior to the transfer.

Q.—Was it to enable Mr. Whitmarsh to pay these arrears that you agreed to hand over to him the three Debentures for £500 each, above referred to? A.—Whatever charges were due upon the Debentures prior to the transfer, Mr. Whitmarsh was to pay.

Q.—For what purpose did you and the town of Peterboro' desire to obtain these Debentures? A.—To assist us in the construction of a branch railroad from the town of Peterboro' to Millbrook.

Q.—Is not that branch road a rival one to the Cobourg and Peterboro', and did not the parties interested in the latter road oppose the attempt to build the Millbrook and Peterboro' branch? A.—It is a rival road, and the parties interested in the Cobourg road did oppose its construction.

By Mr. HOGAN.

Q.—Were you and Mr. Whitmarsh the only parties who had any knowledge of the transaction? A.—We were the only parties, with the exception of the Council of Peterboro'.

By Mr. CAYLEY.

Q.—What would eighteen months interest on £25,000, at 8 per cent., amount to? A.—I think it would amount to considerably more than I gave him. I cannot state the exact amount.

By Mr. FERRIS.

Q.—Would not the interest of $100,000 at eight per cent. for a year, be $8,000, and for eighteen months, $12,000? A.—Yes.

Q.—Are you quite certain as to the date at which you have said the old Debentures were issued? A.—I cannot say.

By Mr. BROWN.

Q.—Has Mr. Whitmarsh paid the back interest on the Wolford Debentures? A.—I do not know.

Q.—Under the conditions of your agreement with Mr. Whitmarsh, ought not the back interest to have been paid over to the Receiver General when the Wolford Debentures were surrendered? A.—I suppose it should. All I know is that the Debentures were handed to me free of charge.

By Mr. CAYLEY.

Q.—You say that you had conversations with the members of the Government on the subject of the transfer of the Wolford Debentures. How often did you speak to the Inspector General on the subject, and where did you hold conversation with him? A.—I never spoke to the Inspector General on the subject but once, and that was on the street, between the Executive Council office and these buildings. I think the Attorney General was walking with him at the time.

The Right of Search.

From the Illustrated London News.

We hear sometimes a great deal about reforming the world—a very hopeless task; yet, if every man would reform himself, the great object would be accomplished. But while it is in the power of every man to reform himself, more or less, or to cease from the commission of any particular offence of which he may have been guilty, it is not in the power of any man to reform any other man by mere violence or force of arms. He may by the influence of his example, or by words of wisdom and persuasion, induce others to reform themselves; but there his influence ceases. And as with men, so with nations. The whole Christian world was once addicted to the unchristian crimes of slave-capturing, slave-making, slave-dealing, and slave-holding. Great Britain was as fondly addicted to these crimes as other nations; and, when her own colony of South Carolina wished to put an end to the Slave Trade, she used her whole authority to prevent the consummation. But—to the immortal honour of the British people, and of the enlightened statesmanship which gave effect to their wishes—Great Britain at last washed her hands both of Slavery and the Slave Trade, and set an example to the world of which it is impossible to calculate the benefit and the glory, past, present and to come. This, with an unremitting persuasion, ought to be enough. To attempt more, and to endeavour to coerce other nations, is to raise questions of comparative physical strength, to excite ill feelings, jealousies, and heartburnings, and to endanger that great blessing of European and American peace, without which there can be no real progress for humanity, and no adequate civilisation in our time.

By what right can Great Britain arrogate to herself the police of Christendom? We know of none, unless it be the right of the strongest—a right to which other nations will not willingly submit, and the exercise of which they will resist by forming alliances for mutual protection. Such philanthropy as this merits the designation of malignant, which has been applied to it in America; and renders the profession of it odious to the rest of the world. The estimable people who think it were wrong to drink a glass of wine, and the innocent and equally estimable persons who call themselves Vegetarians, and think it an offence against reason, nature, and propriety to eat a mutton chop, might, if they were only strong enough to fleets and armies, insist in like manner upon being the policemen of the nations to the full extent of their own doctrines, and visit the houses and the castles of their neighbours to prevent what they conscientiously deem to be the abominable traffic in alcohol and flesh. Great Britain, with her fleets and armies, has really no greater moral right to enforce upon a resisting world, or upon any section of it, great or small, her own philanthropic ideas of Slavery and the Slave Trade than the Teetotallers and the Vegetarians have to enforce their crotchets or dogmas and can only successfully do so by the exercise of the tyranny of the strong over the helplessness of the weak.

This is in reality the true state of the case between Great Britain and the United States of America with reference to the Slave Trade and the Right of Search. In the United States of America the vast majority of the people do not share the philanthropic feelings of Englishmen towards the negro race. Vast numbers of influential men are not in earnest in their hostility to the Slave Trade; and a powerful section of the Union supports domestic slavery as an institution to be extended as well as preserved. Even in the Northern States the "nigger" is the pariah of society—a degraded being, with whom to associate, even in an omnibus, is a thing not to be thought of by many who theoretically condemn and abhor both Slavery and the Slave Trade, and who talk at public meetings of the homogeneity and the equal rights of the human race. Taking the United States of America as a whole, it is evident that as a State, a Government, and a Power, it does not wish to abolish Slavery, and has no much greater objection to it than a cabman has to his beer, or a London alderman to the flesh of oxen or swine. When we reflect that this great transatlantic nation is both powerful in herself and jealous of interference in her affairs, and peculiarly sensitive upon the honour of her flag, we see abundant reasons why the "Right of Search" claimed by Great Britain should be offensive to her people and statesmen. It is impossible but that such a right, real or assumed, exercised upon an unwilling community, should lead to irritation and ill-feeling. Doubtless the conduct of the officers of British cruisers charged with the suppression of the Slave Trade in the Gulf of Mexico has been very greatly exaggerated by American captains and by the American press; but the exaggeration itself is but another proof of the touchiness of the people, and the jealousy of the right thus claimed and exercised. For these and many other reasons we shall sincerely rejoice to hear that the Government of Great Britain—if the facts be as stated in America—has disavowed the intention to act offensively towards the United States, and given the Government of Washington its pledge that such visitations of ships sailing under the American flag shall not be repeated. The Americans require that the flag shall cover the cargo, whether that cargo be cases of slaves; and however much we, as moralists, philanthropists, and Christians, may object to consider black men as a cargo of merchandize, we must leave the sin upon the head of America, and content ourselves with the more humane and enlightened administration of our own affairs.

England is not the Quixote of the world, though there are many well-meaning assistants, in and out of Exeter Hall, who strive to make her so. Neither is England the policeman of the world, although it might be flattering to our national pride if powerful nations would quietly recognise the unwarrantable assumption. In addition to all other sources of cavil, it may well be doubted whether those persons are not right who assert that our zealous efforts to repress the Slave Trade have not greatly increased the horrors of the traffic; and whether the countless millions of money we have expended upon our African anti-slavery squadron have not been utterly wasted, and served no other purpose in their expenditure than to demoralise African chiefs, and to augment the miseries of the unhappy people whom they continue to barter for beads and tobacco in spite of our vigilance and our severity. It is quite certain that our policy in this particular has tended to create a feeling of soreness and exasperation between two of the greatest nations in the world—whose peace and amity are of more practical value to the world than the whole continent of Africa, and all that it produces.

We are convinced that there will be no war upon this question. The British Government must yield the point. The sooner it yields the better. It can do so at present without loss of dignity or honour but if it persists in wounding the feverish susceptibilities of the American people, by the overhauling of American ships in West Indian or in any other waters, the little flame may be fanned into a conflagration, and both parties may be so implicated as to render the humiliation of one or the other a necessary preliminary to adjustment. Than such a consummation we can conceive nothing more disastrous to both. The injury of America is the injury of England. They are closely bound together, by trade and all its multifarious interests and necessities, as if they were one Government as well as one people. It is ours to yield on this question of the Right of Search; and, if we are still determined to intercept slavers, and to do our best to prevent and abolish the infamous Slave Traffic, it is our duty to find some means of accomplishing our end that shall not bring us into perpetual collision with a people as high-spirited and almost as powerful as ourselves.

The great eruption of Vesuvius.

A correspondent of the London Times gives the following interesting account of the commencement and progress of the great eruption of Vesuvius:

As we were about to start a party of French came in from the top of the mountain and told us they had seen a grand sight of lava; we therefore pushed along briskly, the strange cloud hanging more heavily over the "Atrio del Cavallo," and which I now resolved in my own mind was clearly smoke.

The Resina guide now informed us for the first time that lava was flowing through the valley of the "Atrio del Cavallo," and that the ordinary path to ascend the cone to the crater was cut off, and he brought us forward over a path seldom travelled, and of a most difficult nature; we, however, proceeded, the cloud of smoke increasing as we went on all sides. We had to part with our horses and proceed on foot, and had not gone over three or four hundred yards from where we left the horses, when we came up with an enormous mass of hot lava rolling onward towards the Somma, and we now became aware we were in the immediate neighborhood of a considerable eruption. Our anxiety now became great indeed, and we pressed forward, and presently arrived at a wonderful scene. The entire of the lower part of the great cone of Vesuvius appeared on fire, and thick masses of smoke were thrown up, mixed with red hot stones and flakes of lava.—Travelling over a most rugged way of old lava, we made our way up to the point whence the stones, lava and smoke seemed to rise in greatest quantities, and we arrived on a rise just over the greatest fissure.

It is difficult to explain our feelings on beholding this wonderful and unexpected sight. We here found several guides, and from them we learned that at about nine o'clock A. M. that morning a number of small craters and fissures had suddenly opened, and lava had commenced pouring out.

It was now nearly five o'clock, and we went quite close up to the largest crater, which we were enabled to do, as the wind blew steady and strong down the valley, and thus we got within eight or ten yards of the next opening. From this we counted five or six distinct fountains of fire, the largest putting forth volumes of smoke, stones and lava. From another a literal fountain of burning matter was ejected, and from all lava and smoke poured forth in greater or less quantities, the whole torrent of lava uniting into a regular stream of red burning liquid pouring down the inclined side of the valley.

We remained here observing this wonderful sight for over an hour, then determined to ascend to the top of the great cone; our guide was most unwilling to go up, wishing us to return to the Hermitage spoke of danger, late hour, etc.—eventually we persuaded him to advance. After a most severe walk by a path seldom travelled, we toiled to the top, where we arrived to see the last streaks of daylight gilding the distant horizon.

It was now sufficiently dark to see accurately the trace of fire from all the fissures we had left below, and standing on a projecting piece of lava the mouth lay at our feet; the eruption evidently was on the increase, and sheets upon sheets seemed putting forth in fire. The streams of burning lava now became awfully visible, and rolled along at a rapid pace to the bottom of the valley up to the very sides of the Monte Somma. We were perfectly enraged at a sight no pencil could portray or pen describe.

Our guide now urged us to descend; the lava was running exactly towards the path close to the Monte Somma on which we had travelled, and it was quite evident that the smoke which was blown down the valley towards the sea, would, in the event of a change of wind, leave our only path of return in a most impassable condition.

We therefore hastened to descend the cone as well as we could, the conflagration lending us a partial glary light. The descent was difficult and dangerous, and up to our ankles, intermixed with large lumps of old lava. Every moment we were in fear of tumbling head foremost down the precipitate descent. We, however, got aside to the bottom of the cone, and had now to pass the narrow space between the burning lava and Monte Somma, which here presents a face of perpendicular rock, perfectly inaccessible and we became quite aware the torrent of lava might intercept our passage totally; we could not possibly get up the side of Monte Somma.

I must confess I felt here considerably nervous, and I saw the double danger of the lava stopping our path and that of a change of wind, which would certainly have smothered us in an instant and as we pressed on over the ruggid road we saw the eruption increasing momently. In one place the lava was rolling down the mountain in an enormous burning wave, perfectly red hot, and only a few yards from us, and at our point of exit we could see little or no room to pass; and although the sight was one of wonder I never expected to witness, yet we were obliged to press along smartly for our departure through the fiery gate, and when we did arrive at the point of exit, not ten feet remained between the side of the rock and the burning mass of lava. Our guide, however, pressed on briskly, and we passed the ordeal, comfortable from the great heat and the near approach of this fearful burning mass, and, having passed, we rested to see the wonderful sight, now rapidly increasing.

The guides do not seem to know exactly what to make of this eruption. They all seem to agree it will increase greatly, perhaps extend all over the lower valley, and at the rate it was going it would not be long covering a vast district. There has been no flow of lava since 1855, and the upper mountain has been very quiet for some time, and this new flow may or may not be extensive; the torrent of lava at one place could not be less than five or six feet high, and came rolling along at about the rate of five or six feet in a minute, and the united stream of red matter could not be under eight or ten yards wide, and this ran on like a very rapid river until it was impeded by the old lava lying on the side of the valley.

The exact spot of the present eruption is at the lower base of the great cone, and I should say about midway on the Atrio del Cavallo, and about two to two and a-half miles from the hermitage.

We got to Naples at eleven o'clock, and I immediately sat down to put on paper what I saw.

I am told in our hotel the inhabitants were taken by surprise, but I think they are very obtuse in such matters, or, perhaps, careless about them. As soon, however, as the glare was seen from Naples many parties started for the scene.

Naples, May 31.—At about eight o'clock an immense torrent of lava broke over the ridge which confines the basin of craters in the direction of the Somma; it flowed down the declivity of the Somma as an immense torrent of liquid fire, and with such extraordinary rapidity that in less than an hour it had descended through a considerable portion of the mountain. Its progress was then retarded, partly by the diminished steepness of the ground, and partly by the traverse ravines, which must be filled before the fluid can advance. Nothing could exceed the splendor of this torrent of liquid fire, forming the fourth principal stream of lava; but the most extraordinary burst of splendor which has been presented since the commencement of the eruption, took place soon after nine o'clock, when all the mouths seemed to be simultaneously called into violent action, and to vomit forth such torrents of lava that the entire mountain seemed one blaze of fire; the varied colors produced in different parts, owing probably in part to reflection, presented a beautiful and striking appearance. The lurid light diffused from this enormous burning mass rendered visible the subjacent country, the towns, the coast and the bay.

On each night several thousands of persons of all ranks, from the peer to the peasant, urged by curiosity, repair to the scene of this extraordinary spectacle. The darkness being complete, and the route in many parts difficult, each party is furnished with a torch, and the view of these hundreds of torches flitting about between the streams of lava is most curious, representing the appearance of multitudes of fireflies.

June 1.—The eruption is splendid! There are three streams of lava, which begin just between Vesuvius and Somma; we went as near as possible; we climbed to to the top of a ridge of lava which had begun to cool, but it required all the carefulness of our guides to prevent our burning our feet off. On our way down we went to the top of the Observatory, whence the view of the lava was splendid; the middle flowing as fast as water; there was a raised reflection in the smoke which —— said was just like the Aurora Borealis in Scotland. The eruption began last Wednesday night; the lava begins where it did in 1855. There were thousands of people on the mountain; it was an extraordinary scene. At the end of one of the streams of lava that on the Castellamare side of the Hermitage, there was a company, I suppose to stop the lava. There were a saint and some priests in attendance.

"INQUIRE WITHIN" is decidedly the most wonderful and useful book that has been issued for many years. It should be in the hands of every family in the country, as it gives a vast amount of information on every subject connected with domestic life, not procurable in print in any other work. As a book of reference it is invaluable,—it refers to and explains everything, whether you wish to model a flower in wax to ornament a vase by the art of potichomanie; to serve up a relish for breakfast or for supper; to supply a delicious entree for the dinner table; to plan a dinner for a large party or a small one; to cure a headache; to get married; to establish acquaintances according to the rules of etiquette; to play at cards, chess or other games; to enjoy an hour at curious puzzles and arithmetical questions; to tie any kind of a knot; to do up a neat parcel; to relieve the invalid; to write and speak correctly; to acquaint yourself with the technical terms in literature, law and medicine; whether you want to dance; to commence and end a courtship, or whatever you may wish to do, make, or to enjoy, provided your desire has relation to the necessities of domestic life—all you have to do is to procure a copy of Inquire Within, and it will give all the information you want to know.—For sale by Sawers & Murray, Peterboro', Price $1.

A snob is that man or woman who is always pretending to be something better—especially rich or more fashionable—than they are. It is one who thinks his own position in life contemptible, and striving to force himself into one above, without the Education or Characteristics which belong to it; one who looks down upon, despises and overrides his inferiors, or even equals of his own standing, and is ever ready to worship, fawn upon and flatter a rich or titled man, not because he is a good man, a wise man, or a Christian man, but because he has the luck to be rich or consequential.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH THE LOWER PROVINCES.—The steamer Lady Head returned on Sunday from her first trip to the Lower Provinces, bringing up a full complement of passengers. The greatest satisfaction was expressed by the inhabitants of the Gulf ports by the establishment of steam communication with Quebec. A correspondent writing from Gaspe Basin on the third instant says:—"Flying banners and the roar of cannon announced the a rival of the steamer Lady Head, Davidson master, at this place, this morning, at five o'clock, to the great satisfaction of the inhabitants, who have long been desirous of seeing a line of steamers running regularly between the coast and Quebec. Although the steamer arrived at a very early hour, several of the inhabitants hastened on board to greet her worthy commander.

ANOTHER AMERICAN LINE RUN OFF.—The steamers Washington and Hermann of the late Bremen line are to be sold at the Merchants' Exchange, on Tuesday next, to the highest bidder, without reserve.

MAJOR ROBERTSON OF THE 100 REGIMENT.—In our last, we mentioned the appointment of the above gentleman to the Majority of our new Canadian Regiment. In Hart's Army List, we find the following record of his military services:—"Major Robertson served in the Cape Mounted Rifles during the Kaffir war of 1850-51, (Medal), was appointed Field Captain in command of the local force of Armstrong's Horse; in which capacity he was engaged in many most successful operations against the enemy, including the affair against Sayola's tribe, April 16th, 1851, when he captured nearly 2,000 head of cattle; repeatedly had the honour of receiving the highest commendation in General Orders, and special mention in the despatches of Sir Henry Smith, then Governor and Commander-in-Chief. Served in the Eastern campaign of 1854-55, with the 44th regiment, including the battles in the Crimea and siege of Sebastopol, (Medal and Clasps): was mentioned in the despatches in high terms by Lord Raglan and by General Eyre, for the "spirited manner" in which, on the night of the 22nd Nov. 1854, and following morning, he twice repulsed the Russian attack upon an advanced position before Sebastopol.—Quebec Gazette.

The Attitude of France.

From the Illustrated London News.

Great Britain is entitled to ask the Government of France the meaning of the recent large increase of the military and naval armaments of that country. Is there an entente cordiale between the two nations, or is there not? If there be, why the armaments; and who is the enemy against whom they are to be directed? If there be not, as we do not believe there is, or ever can be again, the question still remains, who is the enemy, latent or avowed, present or proximate, against whom France deems it expedient or necessary to be prepared with so many hundreds of thousands of soldiers, and so many tens of thousands of sailors? If France be honest—and in this case France is but another name for the Emperor Napoleon—she is bound to declare, as the Government of England is bound to ask, for what purpose France has so largely increased her steam navy, and within a few weeks ordered by the "inscription maritime" the creation of a naval force of no fewer than 70,000 men? Is this done in recklessness or bravado—or for a purpose?

Perhaps the Emperor of the French feels his throne insecure. If he do not the world does. If he do he may imagine that a war giving employment to his large army and his navy may tend to strengthen his position; and that under such circumstances an enemy is to be found or made. A war against England, who has given neither him nor his nation any just ground of offence, however popular it might be with his army, would inevitably ruin him. England is no despicable foe, as he and all France know, and in a war forced upon her by any unjust aggression on the part of France, her precipitate assailant would hold in their hands the keys of the situation. In such a conflict France would have her utmost opponent either with or without allies. If France were without allies the struggle would not be a lengthened one. A longer purse, greater pith and pluck in the people, and the strength that always crowns, hallows, and supports a rightful cause would give the English the certain victory. If France had allies in the despots of Europe, England would seek and find allies among the people and would not appeal in vain to the populations and nationalities that are now groaning under military tyranny and yearning for constitutional freedom.

But the Emperor—unless the possession of absolute power has already acted on his once clear mind, as it has been so often known to act in the case of other irresponsible despots, and destroyed the balance of the brain—will not commit the error of making war without a cause against a people so great, so rich, so united, and so formidable in every way as the English. At least, the presumption is that he has too much prudence and good sense, as well as justice, to do so. Where then are we to look for the field of warfare? In Africa? No! He has withdrawn within a fortnight a portion of his army from that dependency. In Spain, that he may reclaim, with Louis XIV., "Il n'y a plus de Pyrenees"? The supposition is too wild to be entertained. Is he to make war against Russia? He would gain nothing in that quarter; and it was but the other day that he induced Great Britain to consent to a premature and inglorious peace with that power. In Austria? or Prussia? There is no valid, or indeed any, reason why he should attack either of those powers. Where, then, are we to look? To Italy?

The Emperor is a man who knows how to keep a secret, and is possessed of a remarkable genius for silence. But if he meets war, and if we may judge from the past history of Europe, and from all the cherished traditions of the Napoleonic dynasty, an attempt upon Italy—of which the great Napoleon, his uncle, was King—would be more in accordance with his ideas, if not more in accordance with the ambitious aspirations of the French army than a war against England. An attempt upon Italy might succeed; and a war against England would inevitably fail. For these and fifty other reasons which might be given, it is our opinion—if war be a necessity for the Emperor, either to give work to his Frankenstein of an army, or to carry out interior views of policy which he may have formed with reference to the splendour and permanence of his own dynasty; that the field of operation will be in Italy, rather than in Portsmy Bay or the British Channel.

But whatever be the object of these great armaments which the Emperor is making, so near to our shores, the duty of Great Britain is clear. The efforts necessary for the reconquest of India having almost denuded us of soldiers, it is of first importance that the militia should be again enrolled and increased. The seas that gird our islands are of the strategical value to us of at least three or four hundred thousand men; and with fifty thousand patriotic militiamen to guard the coasts, and transportable at short notice to any point that might be endangered, we should be in a position to render a good account of any hostile force that dared to put foot on our shores. We have already an excellent fleet of steam-ships—the best fleet in the world—but we have not a sufficient number of sailors to man them. It has taken the Government several months to obtain crews for the Marlborough and the Renown; and even at this moment these vessels have not succeeded in enrolling their full complement; but it only requires a little more energy on the part of the Government, the offer of wages a little more tempting to the seafaring population, and the thorough awakening of the popular mind to the urgency of the case—to obtain for Great Britain a Navy that shall make her the indisputable and invincible mistress of the seas, as she managed to be fifty years ago, when her resources and power were much smaller than they are at the present time.

The Emperor acts the part of no true friend or ally when he arms without communication with this country. We owe him nothing, but he owes us much. And we owe this much to ourselves—to be prepared for all emergencies. Were he ever so thoroughly and unmistakeably our fast friend and ally, his seat on the throne is insecure, and the condition of all Europe is restless, unnatural, and precarious. Great Britain and Russia are the only two countries within the whole boundaries that offer any symptoms of stability. Any war, for whatever purpose instigated or commenced by France, will inevitably stir up all Europe to its very foundations; and sooner or later in such a struggle England and Russia, and the nations or governments that shall range themselves on their side, will be the arbiters of the destinies of the Continent. But, to be in the position befitting our past history and present responsibility, the fleets of Great Britain must be immediately and thoroughly manned. Our neighbour's house is on fire, and we must sleep no longer!

☞ THE REASON WHY; a careful collection of many hundreds of reasons for things which, though generally believed, are imperfectly understood. A book of condensed scientific knowledge for the million. By the author of "Inquire Within." When Isaac Newton observed an apple fall to the ground, he asked the "Reason Why;" and in answer to that enquiry, there came one of the grandest discoveries that has ever been recorded upon the book of science. With that discovery a flood of light burst upon the human mind, illustrating in a far higher degree than had ever previously been conceived, the vastness of Almighty Power.

Why should not each of us enquire the "Reason Why" regarding everything that we observe? Why should we mentally grope about, when we may see our way? When addressed in a foreign tongue, we hear a number of articulated sounds, to which we can attach no meaning; they convey nothing to the mind, make no impression upon

BRIEF DEBATE IN PARLIAMENT—THE SLAVE TRADE.

In the House of Lords on the 9th inst., the Earl of CLARENDON, who was occasionally very indistinctly heard in the gallery wished to put a question to his noble friend opposite, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs with reference to the subject to which the noble and learned lord (Brougham) had just alluded. He wished to know whether his noble friend could afford the House any information that might tend to allay the great uneasiness which had prevailed in the public mind during the last few days with reference to certain alleged proceedings on the part of British cruisers, and the preparations it was said the United States government was making to prevent acts which they regarded as equivalent to that right of search which had never been conceded by the United States, and which were looked upon in that country as national insults.—He (Lord Clarendon) believed that no information on the subject had yet been received in this country beyond certain ex parte statements which had been published in the United States, and the abstract of some correspondence which had been laid before Congress by the President. The United States government was the first to declare the slave trade piracy, and he was therefore convinced that the President of the United States and his government were no more desirous than were the government of this country that that trade should be extended. It could not be concealed that vessels belonging to the United States had carried on the slave trade on the coast of Africa; and he did not see how, unless some right of search was given, the real nationality of the flag of suspected vessels could be ascertained. (Hear, hear.) Such a right had been admitted by all maritime nations for their common protection, for without it the most atrocious deeds might be perpetrated and yet remain unpunished. But the possession of such a right was a very different thing from the exercise of it. He was certain that no officer commanding a British cruiser, whatever his suspicions might be, would exercise the right of searching an American vessel if he was really convinced that it was bona fide American. (Hear, hear.) We are as proud as the Americans was of the honour and independence of our flag, and just as determined to protect it whenever protection is lawfully claimed and can be legitimately given—(hear, hear)—but we should consider our flag tarnished if it were made a cover for nefarious transactions such as he had referred to; and so far from finding fault with any foreign Powers which should interpose to prevent the perpetration of such offences, we should rather be obliged to them for their interference. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of MALMESBURY—I am extremely glad that my noble friend opposite has prefaced the question with the judicious language which he has used on this subject. It was of great advantage in a moment of difficulty, when a difference arises between this and any other country, that an eminent member of the opposition should arise in his place and express sentiments and views like those to which my noble friend has just given utterance. I am not in a position to give the House any ascertained information on the subject. Up to this time our information has in a great measure been derived from ex parte statements made on the side of the American government. If these are correctly reported, and proved to have really taken place as described by the American government, certainly her Majesty's government, are not prepared to justify them. (Hear.) I trust that a great deal of exaggeration has taken place in the descriptions I have seen, though, at the same time, I must confess I fear that some acts have been committed that are not justifiable either by international law or by the treaties that exist between this country and the United States. I am informed that on one occasion a body of men were landed from one of her Majesty's ships on the coast of Cuba, though that is of course a Spanish question, which can only be incidentally mentioned when speaking with regard to America. Statements have also been made that considerable annoyance has been occasioned to American trading vessels lying at anchor at Havanna, from a system of rowing round those vessels, watching the cargoes taken out and taken in, exercising surveillance and espionage over them, and finally chasing them out to sea after they left the port. It has also been stated that many American ships in the Gulf have been brought by our cruisers and searched. Now, I say I have not the least idea whether these statements are correct or not, but these are the statements made, and your lordships know that neither international law nor the treaty of 1842 would justify us in taking such measures as these. I entirely agree with what my noble friend has said as to the American flag being constantly prostituted to cover the slave trade, and other illegal acts, and I think it is highly desirable that some agreement should be made between the two countries by which it may be distinctly understood what proceedings ought to be taken by their officers respectively for effectually discovering the impositions to which I have alluded, and which will not be offensive to honest traders. (Hear, hear.) It is to that point I have directed the attention of the government of the United States, and that no later than in a conversation which I had this morning with the American Minister, and I think I may say there has not been any great difference of views between us. (Hear, hear.) After that conversation has been reported to the United States government, after the delivery of the despatch which I have written to Lord Napier, and after the orders that have been sent to our officers in those seas I hope there will be no repetition of such acts as have been described to us, whether truly or not. (Hear, hear.) In these circumstances I feel that this country need remain under no apprehension that anything will occur to break the alliance that so happily exists between the two countries.

The Earl of HARDWICK said, in reference to the naval part of the subject, that the mode of operations of inquiry into the nationality of a vessel had been clearly laid down, and if there had been any excess of those instructions it was against the direction that no offence was to be given to any nation in conducting the operations in those seas.

The Murder.

In order that the readers of the Pilot may understand the case thoroughly, we give the following facts, as elicited at the trial, which took place at the last term of the Court of Queen's Bench:—In the small and beautiful village of St. Jerome, situated about 20 miles from Montreal, there lived in January last, a man named Antoine Desforges, and his wife, the deceased Catherine Prevost. They were people in humble life, but in their own way well to do in the world. They were childless, and lived alone. She is described by those who knew her well, as a woman of unblemished character, and vigorously devoted to her household duties. In general her husband, who seems to have proved himself rather a weak than a strong man, treated her with kindness. He spoke of her at times, even with tenderness; while at others his language showed plainly that he was tired of her, and betrayed a desire to get rid of her. In the same village, and at the distance of a few acres from the house of Antoine Desforges, resided his brother Jean Baptiste Desforges, with his family. About six miles from St. Jerome, lived Marie A. Beliste, the widow of a farmer by that name, who died about 18 months ago, leaving his wife and considerable property, and a large family. It was notorious that during three or four years previous to and since her husband's death, a great intimacy had existed between Madame Beliste and Antoine Desforges; and in the Autumn of 1856, this woman's husband died suddenly, and a few weeks after one of her children, both under circumstances which led to the belief, that they had been poisoned by Madame Beliste.—These suspicions, however, died away; and were only aroused again by the death of Catherine Prevost, the wife of Antoine Desforges, in January last. In consequence of this event, and of the Crown's having obtained evidence of some circumstances preceding and attending the death of the farmer Beliste, his widow was indicted at the last term for the murder of her husband, and Antonie Desforges also as accessory before the fact. A true Bill was found against both, by the Grand Jury, and and Antonine Desforges, having been acquitted on the charge of having been accessory to the murder of his wife, awaits his trial on the former accusation.

On the 18th January Antonine Desforges left his house alone early in the morning with his horse and sleigh, intending to visit a natural son of Madame Beliste's, residing about 30 miles from St. Jerome, by the name of Isidore Legault. The pretext given for the journey was to invite Legault to the marriage of his sister, Olive Beliste, was to take place a week subsequently.—setting out, Desforges stopped at an inn about seven miles from the village, and after telling the inn-keeper's wife where he was going, enquired if they could accomodate him for the night on his return he would probably sleep there. He was told that lodgings would be provided for him.—He left almost immediately, went to Isidore Legault's house, but did not find Legault at home he having been on a visit to his mother, Madame Beliste, the day previous. On his way home, Desforges met Legault, who invited him to return with him. Desforges assigning as a reason that his wife was alone and was unwell, and that he did not like remaining absent from home at night. They parted, and Desforges reached the inn about half-past six o'clock in the evening. It was proved at the trial of the inn-keeper that neither Desforges nor his horse seemed the least fatigued; the weather and the roads beautiful, and Desforges was about three quarters of an hour's drive from his own house where, as he said, his wife was alone and ill. He passed the night at the inn, spoke of his wife as old and in ill health and added that if she died, he would marry a young woman. So agitated was he, that during the night he slept but little and made considerable noise running about the room. After breakfast the following day, he left, and reached home about 8 o'clock. He found his house filled with strangers, and his wife dead. His first exclamation, when returning from the room, where the lifeless body of the deceased lay, was, "If I had been here, my wife would not have died." Madame Beliste then remarked, "You know that you asked me to come and pass the night with your wife." At first he denied, but afterwards admitted, that he had done so. There is a variety of other circumstances in Antoine Desforge's conduct, calculated to create a strong impression that he was aware of what was going on at his house on the fatal night. The above are the principal facts. The Jury, however, did not find in them sufficient evidence of his participation in the murder, to convict him of being an accessory before the fact. We must now revert to Madame Belisle and Jean Baptiste Desforges.

At about 12 o'clock, on the day preceding the night of the murder, Jean Baptistie Desforges arrived at Madame Belisle's on foot, and passed the afternoon with her, at her house. It does not appear that he had any ostensible business there.—They left Belisle's together, towards evening, in Madame Belisle's sleigh, and drove towards the village. They were alone, and arrived about dark at Antoine Desforges house, in the village. Jean Baptiste Desforges unharnessed the horse, put him in his brother's stable, and afterwards remained some time in the house with his sister-in-law, Catherine Prevost, and Madame Belisle. It was proved that no relationship existed between the Desforges and Madame Belisle, and that she never slept there in the husband's absence.—About eight o'clock Jean Baptiste Desforges went to a neighbour's and played cards with the family till half-past 9 o'clock.—A few minutes after Jean Baptiste Desforges came into the neighbour's, the woman of the house, a Madame Urbain, wishing to know the hour, went to Antoine Desforges' house, which was about thirty feet from her husband's and there, to her great surprise, as she said, found Madame Belisle seated by the stove, in conversation with the deceased, Catherine Prevost, who seemed to be cheerful and in her usual health. It was then half past eight o'clock. After remaining there a few minutes Madame Urbain returned to her own house, where Jean B. Desforges was still playing cards with her husband, and some other members of the family.—About an hour afterwards, Jean B. Desforges rose to leave, and then Madame Urbain, who had not mentioned that she had been at his brother's, remarked that his sister-in-law had visiters, whereupon Desforges said "No." Madame Urbain then said, "Yes, she has; I saw Madame Belisle there a short time ago." A conversation then ensued involving evasions and misstatements on the part of J. B. Desforges, and in the course of which, he expressed his belief that his sister-in-law was very ill, and that she would not live many days. When he was leaving Madame Urbain asked him if he was going to sleep at his sister-in-law's that night. He answered, 'No; as Madame Belisle is there, I would not pass the night at my brother's for 25,000 francs, because of Catherine was to die suddenly, people would suppose that a murder had been committed; but I intend to stop at the house for my overcoat." From there he went to his brother's, and at twenty minutes to ten o'clock, it was proved beyond a doubt, that the deceased, Madame Belisle, and Jean Bte. Desforges, were alone in the house. Instead of going home, and without any assignable reason, Desforges passed the night at his brother's. The room in which he is said to have slept, adjoined the deceased's bed-room and communicated with it by a door. Madame Belisle, it was supposed, had slept with the deceased. As above stated, these three persons were alone in the house that night. At a few minutes past midnight, Baptiste Desforges ran out of the house, knocked loudly at the neighbour Urbain's door, crying out that "Catherine (meaning the deceased) was dying." Madame Urbain, one of whose children was ill, had not yet gone to bed; she opened the door and went immediately with Desforges to his brother's house,—There she found Madame Belisle standing by deceased's bedside looking at the corpse with a candle in her hand. Madame Urbain and all the witnesses, testify to the same fact, that the deceased was lying on her pillow with the left hand on her breast and the right arm extended by her side.—One pillow was near the middle of the bed, and it was evident to all the witnesses that the deceased alone had slept in the bed that night; although it appeared as if it had been otherwise disturbed. They also say that the eyes of the deceased were closed and the mouth partly so. The face and hands of Catherine Prevost were cold—there were no external marks of violence, and the witnesses who saw her immediately after the alarm was given, testified that the deceased's countenance wore an appearance of sweet and settled repose, and that as she lay there dead, she was more beautiful than when she was alive. on touching the body, Madame Urbain exclaimed, 'Oh God she is dead!' 'Do you think so?' calmly remarked Madame Belisle. At the request of the latter a small mirror was applied, but there was no sign of life.—Another witness who entered about ten minutes after this conversation between Madame Urbain and Madame Belisle, found the latter in the room with the body, and in the act of wetting the lips with a feather; and he remarked, 'what are you doing, don't you see she is dead.'—'Do you think so?' replied the woman. All the witnesses concurred in their opinion that the position of the deceased was artificial, and that she had been dead some time before the alarm was given. At first it was suspected that she had been poisoned, but no trace of poison could be found in the body.

The medical evidence was to show that the deceased had died from suffocation. On these facts then the jury brought in Antoine Desforges "Not Guilty,"—the Widow Beisle Jean Baptiste Desforges as guilty of murder, and for this murder was it this morning they forfeited their lives on the gallows.—Montreal Pilot.

An Incident at Niagara Falls.

BY MRS. GASKELL.

"You were in too much agitation this morning," said Madame Percival, "to take much interest in a scene that was present to my mind as we looked upon the rapids, but I think I must tell it you now. I said that I had often been at the Falls. It must be nine or ten years since what I am going to tell you about happened during one of my visits. You noticed the small rocks that came up to the surface in the current just above the rapids. Of course they form obstacles to the drift-wood and rubbish that is constantly being borne down the stream; and this accumulation of stray substances has, in time, formed some of these rocks into islands. There is one of the largest just in the middle of the rushing waters, where the impetuous torrent is fullest and widest, not half a mile from the Falls. It is covered with brush-wood, and even some trees of a tolerable growth. I was walking on the shore one day, and came to the road just opposite to this island. There I saw a hundred or so of people collected, now still and breathless, now moved about as by some common sympathy.—What could be the matter? I walked hastily up, and then, looking by sympathy to the point on which all eyes seemed fixed, I saw two men on this island—two Irishmen, as they told me—who, ignorant of the force of the rapids, had undertaken to cross the river in a boat—going to their day's work, as I think they said—at a point too near the Falls for any one but a stranger to attempt. Their boat had long since been whirled away over the Falls. They were saved as by a miracle; they had been carried by the force of the stream, dashing against this piece of resistance—this little island, not two hundred yards off, and had sprung out on the safe ground, as it were, by instinct; but it seemed but like exchanging one kind of death for another.—They were safe from the Falls; but no human being had ever set foot on that island, surrounded by the whirling floods; it seemed beyond the power of man to reach it—how much the more to escape from it! Any one who attempted it would be carried down a short two minutes' agony of swift, relentless torrent, and then—God pity the state of that creature dashed down the Falls! The thought of that ghastly sweep of waters made the little crowd silent and motionless, even while looking on at the passionate gestures (no doubt accompanied by many words and cries that were utterly lost in the roar of many waters) of the two men, who, now kneeling—now standing up and tossing their arms aloft in the air—now down again on their pleading knees, their heads buried in their hands, as if trying to drown the perpetual rush of the resounding torrent, and to speak their last earthly words to God with clear and steady minds. Oh, my God! what could we—helpless men—do for these our brothers? Through the crowd came a cry; it cleft our murmered, whispered words like a sharp, flaming sword; it was the wife of one of the doomed men.

"'Are you blind, lame, stocks and stones?' she said, as she would have waded deep into the tossing waters if two or three strong men had not held her by main force. 'He has seven children, the youngest a sucking babe. Harken to him!' for she heard him, or thought she heard him. 'For the love of God!' he cries; 'for the love of the Blessed Virgin, send help.' 'Patrick! Patrick!' she screeched—as if he could hear—'are ye thinking on the blessed Lady of many sorrows in the little church of Droughadmore at Home?' 'Oh,' said she, dropping her voice, 'that we had never left our home, and the oul' parents, who blessed us where we left, and are thinking on us now, little dreaming what a death lies before us; for if he dies, I will die, and God help the orphans!'

"Suddenly a man came up, stripped to his trowsers. I believe he had been in the crowd before, only I had not noticed him. He was a fine, stalwart young fellow, with a rope tied round his waist, and the end of the coil in the hands of another man. Two or three were following him, evidently dissuading him from undertaking such a treméndous risk, as I saw in his flaming eye and compressed lip he himself believed it to be. They were speaking low and earnestly. I only caught one piece of his answer. 'Take care of my old mother, boys; but that I know you will. You man out there has wife and children. I have none.' Then he came up to the passionate, woeful woman, and told her that, by God's help, he would strive to save her husband, and bade her bless him before he went. She looked him steadily in the face for a moment, as if reading his soul, and then lifted up her arms and blessed him. 'God be with thee in thy going out and in thy coming in; in the deep waters as on the dry land; in the struggle of thy life, as in the deeper struggle of thy death! God be with the evangelists. His will be done!'

"And, as if the reference to God had calmed the tumult of her despair, or it might be from pure physical exhaustion, she sat down meekly and mutely, outward down by the side of the terrible stream, and buried her head in her gown-tail, which she had worn, like many of her countrywomen, in lieu of a cloak or shawl.

"The young man really he who held the end of the coil of rope began to unbind the coarse of the harvest. We lost sight of them for a time. We held our breaths. The only sound that broke the dead silence that coexisted with the rush and crash of the torrent were the low, muttered prayers of the poor Irishwoman, as we heard her telling her beads. At length some one cried out, 'There he is!' and sure enough, high up at the head of the river, we saw a little black scallop shell of a boat, steered or skulled (I don't know which you call it) by one man; it was whirled, and tossed, and thrown hither and thither by the white, foaming rapids, not yet—where he was—at their full force, but gathering fury every yard that he neared the island, still two or three hundred yards away. All the steersman's energy and power seemed reserved for the one action of tacking from rock to rock, so that at each obstacle he could take breath and rearrange the boat. He was drifted swiftly from rock to rock. At times we feared his strength would not suffice to guide his little boat to the next point of land among the seething waters, and that we should see him borne past us like lightning, carried hopelessly to the Falls by the tremendous rapid. At times we lost him behind the scrubby brushwood that grew here and there on an islet larger than the others; but at length the last passage was made; he was there on the island. We saw him rousing & comforting the men, who by this time had sunk into the weakness and the stupor of despair. He cheered them up, he patted their backs, he pointed to us, or rather to the poor shrouded wife, still praying with hidden eyes. Then at last we watched him cut down some tree-branches, and lay them in the bottom of the boat—we could not imagine why—and then there was some arrangement of the rope he had taken with him. I hardly know how—for by this time the poor wife had gone down to the ground with a heavy fall and a long sobbing groan in a dead faint, from which no efforts of mine could rouse her—nothing in short, but her husband, as—saved and rescued by that brave young man—he stood by her, and took her in his arms, and cheered her and comforted her by the sound of that voice she thought never to hear more."

"And the young man—what became of the young man?" asked I.

"Why" (and Madam Percival's eyes were wet with tears, although her mouth was smiling), "we did not know how to make enough of him—some of us blessed him, and some of us shook him by the hand,—he, all the time, trying to get rid of us, and making light of his daring, and at last escaping from us, under pretence of needing to change his clothes, which were indeed wet through with the spray and the dashing waters. When he was out of sight the oldest man among the crowd took off his hat, and just thanked God in as few and simple words as you can well imagine; and then held the hat to us all, without another word of explanation. We knew what it was for; for while the young man had been gone up the wooded shore, before he had embarked upon the roaring waters—we could not have spoken a word then—it had been bruited that he was a poor working lad, who maintained his old mother by daily labor—and we longed to make his life a bit easier to him henceforth. So one put in a watch as pledge for something more, and many put in dollars, and some few put in cents (with tears that they had no more to give), and altogether there were from three to four hundred dollars either paid or promised, by the time he came out of the kind of public-house into which he had gone to change his clothes. Those who were on the watch for him brought him to us again—unwilling and sheep-faced, though he did not know why we wanted him. Then the old man (who would fain have made a speech, only words failed him) shoved the hat into his hand, and burst into tears.

"The young fellow looked at the money—looked round at us all—and then quietly placed the hat on the ground. 'Thank you all, kindly,' said he; 'but I can't take it.' He gave no reason; only replied over and over again in the same words. 'Thank you kindly; but I can't take it.' We could do nothing at the moment; but it was suggested (and the idea was followed out) that the house in which his mother lived, and the rent of which he had to pay, should be bought, and given to the old woman, before he knew anything about it. Meanwhile, he said, in a simple and straightforward manner enough, 'I cut a few stems and branches down from yon place. I thought as no man had ever been there before, to my knowledge, no one might happen to go there again; and they might be kind of curiosities in the way of walking-sticks. I reckon to make six or seven of 'em, and I hope they will not be thought too high-priced at half a dollar each.'

"You may be sure there was a rush for them; and many a one cried, 'Let them be put up to auction?' But no! the first bidders had them; and no begging or entreaty could make him take more than half a dollar for each."

Provincial Parliament.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

FRIDAY, June 25, 1858.

Mr. BROWN replied at some length to the attack of the Attorney General, showing that every statement he had made was a misrepresentation of the facts and rebuking him for replying to the just animadversion against his administration by personal assaults. While he was speaking, he was angrily interrupted more than once by the member for Carleton, who sits in the midst of the Opposition. Mr. Brown remarked upon his interruptions, and told him that all the members of the Opposition felt that his sitting there in their midst, listening to every word that was said between members of the party was a gross indelicacy. Mr. Brown concluded with a short review of the charges against the Government, as shown in the evidence laid before the Committee.

Mr. POWELL (Carleton) rose and said he was sorry to see that the hon. member for Toronto had left his seat, because he desired to say something personal to that gentleman that he wished him to hear. He was favorable to the fullest discussion. He did not want to restrain the liberty of the press, nor of the debate in that House; but he did wish to say what he thought of the conduct of the hon. member for Toronto, who did not confine himself to fair discussion, but wanted to domineer over everybody. The fact was, that that gentleman was nothing better than a ranting, roaring, determined demagogue, who could discuss nothing like other people; but who cast an unpleasantness on every debate in which he took part. (Here Mr. Brown came in and took his seat.) He had heard lately a good deal about Finance, (holding up a paper) he had got an account there of a model Treasurer. It was plain this money question was one of great importance. He did not desire it to be expressly understood that he referred very particularly to that hon. gentleman when he said there were some people in the House so frantic on account of the debts they owed to their banking establishments, that they wanted to dip their hands into the public purse, in order to relieve themselves of their difficulties. But he desired to deal with that which was personal to himself. The member for Toronto had accused him (Mr. Powell) of the crime of listening to what was said on the Opposition side of the House, and of conveying the information to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. "But," exclaimed the member for Carleton, sinking his voice to a whisper, "if any one has complained of this, "they never, sir, mentioned it to me. They "never, sir, came over to my seat to inform "me of their complaints." Then suddenly, in a terrible voice, looking fiercely round the House, and clenching his fist, he added, "If there is any one on this side of the "House who thinks so, let him say it. If, "sir, there is a man on this side of the "House who would dare impute to me dis-"honour, let him whisper it, sir—(laughter) "—let him whisper it, sir, to me, and"—[And an appeal made to the chairman at this moment by Mr. Rymal, to send in four or five strong men to restrain the excited member, drew down a burst of laughter and cut short the mock-heroic sentence.] He continued still in the same truculent voice, accompanied by the most violent gesticulations, to say that, the hon. member for Toronto has accused me of going to his desk in order to frighten him. Well, if the hon. member was alarmed when he saw me, I could not help it. He certainly lowered his tone when I came near him, but what his reason was he best knew. The hon. member said he was not afraid; but let him only waive the privileges of this House for five minutes—let him only say where he had not those privileges, what he has said here—and we shall see who is afraid. Ah! Mr. Chairman—

Here Mr. MOWAT asked the Chairman if he could allow such conduct as was exhibited by the member for Carleton?

Mr. BROWN hoped that leave would be given for all the member for Carleton had to say.

Mr. POWELL—Well, I am coming to to this story about the model Treasurer. But first of all I find this paragraph:—"The Globe is now fairly in the ranks of the Tory press. It is perhaps unenviable that the press of a new country should occasionally fall into the hands of penniless, unprincipled adventurers, who have decamped from older communities to avoid the strong arm of the law which their crimes had caused to be inflicted against them." Ah! Mr. Chairman, that you see is how it is that we have such a press as we have. It is because newspapers sometimes fall into the hands of "penniless scamps"—"who have decamped from older communities." (After a pause.) Perhaps the House did not quite understand this, so I shall read it again. (Here he repeated the paragraph quoted above.) Now, that came from a particular friend of the hon. member for Toronto. The Globe says, never was proposition so disgraceful—the model ex-Treasurer being the judge, and no one can be so unjust as to deny that he is deeply skilled in all sorts of morality—good, bad, and indifferent." Now, here is something else about the model ex-Treasurer:—"Mr. Macdougall refers to Mr. Brown [senior's] Edinburgh history, and hints more than he dare speak." Now, Mr. Chairman, there must be a great deal in such a hint as that—more than he dare speak, sir. But here is what he says:—"The Globe has lately introduced a new rule into newspaper polemics, by which the impersonality of editors is repudiated, and liberty given to distinguish the productions of one editor from another in the same journal. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and the Globe will have no right to complain if we apply to that journal its own rule. In the absence of "big George," who is making himself the butt of the sensible Reformers in Kent, the late Treasurer of the city of Edinburgh, has edified the public with a dissertation on political principle. Well, it is extremely funny this! such a lecture from such a source. It is rich beyond comparison. But, as the devil can quote scripture, and prostitutes preach virtue—we don't see that there is anything at all strange in it. The model ex-Treasurer commences by asking us questions. We must let our readers see what the model ex-Treasurer can say." Here is another extract, sir:—

"ANTECEDENTS OF THE BROWN FAMILY —MR. BROWN SHOWN TO BE A PROFLIGATE—AND THE GLOBE A MASS OF PUTRIDITY.

"If we did not know that there are persons of some pretensions to respectability amongst us who still countenance the moral profligate whose shameless falsehoods are poured forth on society through that polluted channel, the Globe, we should not feel justified in occupying our space with the refutation. There have been states of society where the moral debasement of the mass has sunk so low that vice and crime would stamp their imprint on the brazen foreheads of the votaries, and send them abroad upon the community without punishment and without reproach. Listen, ye duped, ye diddled electors of Kent, and rejoice that you have such a worthy representative. The task of dissecting such a mass of putridity is disgusting. We feel as if we had been cutting up a dead dog. * * * * *

We repeat that you are a most unblushing, a most incorrigible——. We leave our readers to fill up the blank." Now, sir, the man who wrote that is the intimate friend of the member for Toronto, though he has written thus of that member's father. Why, sir, (in a voice more furious than ever) such a fellow, sir, is worse than a murderer. Yes, sir, I say that a man who could take to his bosom,—could give his hand to the writer of such an article, is worse than a murderer of his father—worse than a parricide, sir. [The last passage getting more and more ferocious till it approached the close.]

Mr. DORION appealed to the Government—the guardians of the dignity of the House—whether such disgraceful language could be permitted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Dunkin)—I am bound to say that but for the most extraordinary tone this debate had assumed for a long time before I was called upon to take the chair. I could not have listened to very much that has been said during the time I have occupied my present position. Considering how much I had heard before I took the chair, that was disgraceful to the House, and a disgrace to the members in the eyes of the country, I thought I was not now called upon to interfere. I do, however, trust that the hon. members will see the absolute necessity of confining the discussion to the question before the chair. (Cheers.)

Mr. BROWN—I hope that this attack, since it has been carried so far, will be allowed to be completed, and that I shall have an opportunity to reply.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD—I do not interfere for the reason just mentioned.

Mr. POWELL—I did not invite any personal attack; but the member for Toronto is constantly attacking other people, and he has vilified and abused every man of mark in Upper Canada, even the man without whom there would be no Reform party at all.

Mr. POWELL continued to quote from the paper in question, though he was repeatedly called to order by the chairman. At last he said as they were on the Finances, he would read one other paragraph, which would be found to be quite in order, because the question was one of Finance. He then read:—

"We presume the Speaker, and several gentlemen, even some of the Reformers who did not go to the dinner would reward the Globe for the information. Rumour says he has taken with him some £15,000 of other people's money. It is the same principle that brought the Glasgow Treasurer to New York."

Mr. THIBAUDEAU said he had witnessed such scenes in this House as he had never seen anywhere else; but he thanked God the Lower Canadian members were exempt from such disgraceful conduct. The House had fallen to such a state of degradation, that they were everywhere regarded as a brutal set of ruffians. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. BROWN—When the member for Clarelon was interrupted, I entreated the House to permit him to go on and state all he could. The attack that has just been made on me is in strict keeping with the tactics of the gentlemen on the Treasury benches on other occasions than this. When they have found themselves unable to meet established charges of grave public impropriety, their habitual resort has been to assail with gross personal outrage those who disclosed the facts; and I hesitate not to affirm that the assault the member for Carleton has just made is but the well understood climax of the scenes lately witnessed, that was to crush me forever as a public man. But if I can obtain the attention of the House for a short space, I think I will satisfy every man who hears me that this last arrow has been shot as completely in vain as those that have preceeded it.—This is not the first time that the insinuation that I was a public defaulter in my native city has been aimed at me—it has been echoed before now from the organs of the Ministry—and at many an election contest have I been compelled to sit patiently and hear the tale recounted in the ears of assembled hundreds. For fifteen years I have been content to bear in silence these imputations—I would that I could yet refrain from refering to the painful theme—but the pointed and public manner in which the charge has now been made, and the fear that the public cause with which I am identified might suffer by my silence, alike tell me that the moment has come when I ought to explain the transaction as I have always been able to explain it, and to cast back the vile accusation of dishonesty on those who dared to make it. (Hear, hear.) That my father was a merchant in the city of Edinburgh—and that he engaged in disastrous business speculations, commencing in the inflated times of 1825 and 1826 and terminating ten years afterwards in his failure—is undoubtedly true. And it is, unhappily, also true that he did hold a public office, and that funds connected with that office were, at the moment of his sequestration, mixed up with his private funds to the extent, I believe, of £2,800 sterling. For the sum in default, four friends and relatives were sureties, and they payed the money among them. Part of that money has already been restored—every sixpence of it will be paid shortly—property has been long set aside for the payment of that debt to its uttermost farthing. (Loud and continued cheering.) My father felt that while that money remained unpaid, there was a brand on himself and his family and he was wrought—wrought as few men have wrought to pay off not only that, but other obligations of a sacred character. Many a Bill of Exchange, the proceeds of his labour, has he sent to old creditors who were in need of what he owed. For myself, Sir, I have felt equally bound with my father—as his eldest son, I felt that the fruits of my industry should stand pledged, until every penny of these debts were paid and the honour of my family vindicated—(loud cheers)—and an honourable member opposite (Mr. Angus Morrison), who I regret to hear cheering on the person who made this attack, might have known that under the legal advice of his relative, I long ago secured that in the event of my death, before the accomplishment of our long-cherished purpose,—that after the payment of my own obligations, the full discharge of those sacred debts of my father should stand as a first charge on my ample estate—debts, Sir, which I was no more bound in law to pay than any gentleman who hears me. A burst of enthusiastic cheering, in which the galleries heartily joined.)

Mr. BURTON—(who along with Mr. Fellowes had been sitting beside M. Powell spurring him on his recent attack)—Mr. Chairman there is a noise in the gallery.—I move that the galleries be cleared!

Cries of shame! Disgraceful!

Mr. BROWN.—The hon. gentleman, sir, would clear the galleries! Yes—that is the sort of idea such people as these have of fair play! They have made their charges, they have uttered their slanders in the ears of hundreds, and they would send them home with the reply unheard, they would deprive me of the opportunity of giving to those who heard the charge its ample refutation! But I was proceeding to say, Sir, that for the painful transaction to which I have been forced to allude, I am no more responsible than any gentleman in this assembly. It happened in 1836—I was at that time but 17 years of age—I was totally unconnected with it—but young as I was, I felt then as I feel now the obligation it laid upon me, and I vowed that I should never rest until every penny had been paid. (Loud cheers.) There are those present who have known my every action since I have set my foot in this country—they know I have not eaten the bread of idleness—but they did not know the great object of my labour, the one end of my desire for wealth was that I might pay those debts and redeem my father's honour. (Loud cheers.) Thank God, Sir, my exertions have not been in vain—thank God, Sir, I have long possessed property far more than sufficient for all my desires—but as hon. gentlemen know, it is one thing in this country to have property and another to be able to withdraw a large sum in money from a business in active operation—and many a night have I laid my head on my pillow after a day of toil, estimating and calculating if the time had yet arrived when with justice to those to whom I stood indebted, and without fear of embarrassment resulting, I might venture to carry out the purpose of my life. (Enthusiastic cheering.) Sir, I have been accused of being ambitious—I have been charged with aspiring to be Prime Minister of this great country, and of lending all my energies to the attainment of that end; but I only wish I could make my opponents understand how infinitely surpassing all this—how utterly petty and contemptible in my thoughts have been all such considerations, in comparison with the one longing desire to discharge these duties of honour, and vindicate these Scottish principles that have been instilled into me since my youth. (Great cheering.) The hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Benjamin McDonald) is well aware that every word I have spoken to-night has been long told him in private confidence—and he knows, too, that last summer I was rejoicing in the thought that I was at last in a position to visit my native land, with a large sum necessary for all the objects I contemplate, and that I was only prevented doing so by the financial storm that swept over the continent. Such, Sir, are the circumstances on which this attack is founded—such the facts on which I have been denounced as a public defaulter and refugee from my native land. But why, asked the person who made the charge, has he sat silent under it?—why, if the thing is false, has he endured it so many years. What, Sir!—Free myself from blame by inculpating one so dear! Say "it was not I who was in fault—it was my father!" Rather would I have lost my right arm than utter such a word! (Long and continued cheering.) No, Sir, I waited the time when the charge could be met as it only might be fittingly met; and my only regret even now is that I have been compelled to speak before these debts have been entirely liquidated. But it is due, Sir, to my aged father that I explain, that it has not been with his will that these imputations have so long been pointed at me, and that it has only been by earnest remonstrance I have prevented his vindicating me in public long ere now. Sir, the hon. gentleman who has sought to put the brand of dishonesty on me and on my family—

Mr. POWELL—I rise to a point of order. I do not desire anything of the kind, Mr. Brown, senior, is a gentleman for whom I have much respect, (Cries of "Sit down!") but what I found fault with was —(Loud cries of "Chair, chair," and "Sit down!" amid which Mr. Powell gave way.

Mr. BROWN—If the member for Carleton thinks any words of his can ruffle me, he makes an entire mistake. If I have been able to endure patiently for 15 years the false taunts of such as he—it is not now that I am to be—

Mr. BURTON.—You supported and returned to Parliament the man who first made the charge!

Mr. BROWN—If during the abrupt political changes witnessed in the last ten years, I had refused to act with every one who has at some time or other maligned me—I must have debarred myself from political alliance, and deprived my country from personal feelings of the firm phalanx we now see ranged on these benches. (Hear, hear.) Had the hon. member for North Oxford who first made these charges—and had he never retracted them to this time—I would, indeed, have been unworthy had I lent him my influence to take a seat in this House. But the hon. member for Oxford was not the first who made these charges—his journal but echoes what others had ventured years before to insinuate—and the moment he had the true facts of the case, he promptly, fully, generously retracted all he had said, and apologized for the injury he had been led unwittingly to inflict. That letter has now been two or three years before the public—and it is to the disgrace of the member for Carleton and his political allies, that, notwithstanding that full retraction, the accusation has been brought up at every election as from my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall,) and scattered by thousands broadcast over the country; nay, Sir, that on this same authority, long since withdrawn, the charge has been repeated here this very night. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) The hon. member for Carleton, Sir, now pretends that he did not mean to insinuate anything against my father—that he has a high respect for his character. I thank him not for the acknowledgment—no man in Toronto perhaps is more generally known in the community, and I think I could appeal even to his political opponents to say if there is a citizen of Toronto at this day more thoroughly respected and esteemed. (Cheers from both sides of the House.) With a full knowledge of all that has passed, and all the consequences that has flowed from a day of weakness, I will say that an honester man does not breath the air of Heaven—that no son feels prouder of his father than I do to-day—and that I would have submitted to the obloquy and reproach of his every act, not fifteen years but fifty—aye, had gone down to the grave with the cold shade of the world upon me—rather than that one of his gray hairs should be injured. (The hon. gentleman took his seat amidst enthusiastic and prolonged applause.)

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD was glad to hear testimony to the truth of what had been stated by Mr. Brown, for that gentleman had spoken to him on the subject with an earnestness that proved his intention to carry out his purpose and convinced him, (Mr. Macdonald,) that if he had not had an opportunity of paying the debt before, the circumstance had been to him a trial and a trouble. He thought it must have been highly satisfactory to Mr. Brown to have been enabled to make the statement he had done, for it was as honourable to him as the attack was outrageous and shameful to its author. (Hear, hear.) He must say, that there was nothing in his experience to equal the slanderous imputations which had been cast from one side of the House at the other; but which had been chiefly directed against the hon. member for Toronto, as he believed, for the sole purpose of diverting attention from the great questions before the House. He regretted the scene which had taken place, and was still more sorry to see the Government sit quiet and listen to what had been said. If Mr. Baldwin had been on the Treasury Benches, he would have been the first to stand up and protect the hon. member for Toronto from such an attack. (Hear, hear.) He repeated, that he was rejoiced at the vindication of his character, which the member for Toronto had that evening had an opportunity of making, after suffering from the imputations made upon him for so many years. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. MACDOUGALL said that after the extracts made from a journal with which he had once been connected, it was incumbent on him to make a few remarks. In performing his duty as a public journalist, it might be true that he had sometimes used language in speaking of public men, which was not justifiable, and that which in his cooler moments he regretted. With respect to the questions which had split up the Reform party which he had expressed, he was ready to maintain, and he should adhere to them in that House. But at the time when these extracts were written, he and Mr. Brown, though both belonging to the Reform party, took different views of the course to be adopted. During the course of the dispute, information was conveyed to him as such things are conveyed to editors, and he did at the time believe that information as to the subjects to which the extracts referred. But with regard to them, he had had occasion to explain that he was not the writer of them, and the gentleman who did write them, was, at that moment he believed in the pay of the gentlemen on the Treasury Benches. At the time of their publication, he was canvassing the County of Oxford for Mr. Hincks, and the person he spoke of was left in charge of his journal. Though the extracts were put separately—they were not from a series of articles, but one article, as it would be seen on a reference to them, since the compiler of them had not been cunning enough to have cut the cloth, which were all of Nor'wester Style. The article was not only one continuous whole, but inserted contrary to the usage of the press, because he knew it was of a nature to bring him into the law courts. Forbearing till a congregation took took place between himself and the member for Toronto, that he had received any contradiction of the story. After that he at once retracted. He concluded by deprecating such scenes as that which had just

THURSDAY, JULY 1, 1858.

The Welford Job.

Mr. Conger has given his evidence before the Committee on Public Accounts, as will be seen on the first page; there is evident equivocation and mental evasion throughout, but if we may judge of the character of the whole by a palpable falsehood in his answer to one question, the whole must be rejected, for that is the law of evidence. Mr. Brown asks Mr. Conger whether the Municipality has taken any action upon the transaction, and Mr. Conger answers, that he is not aware of any. That evidence was given on the 23rd June. On the 17th June Mr. Conger received the following from the Town Clerk of Peterboro:

PETERBOROUGH, June 17th, 1858.

W. S. CONGER, Esq.,

SIR,—In pursuance to a resolution of the Town Council, passed last night, I am instructed to call upon you for all the papers in your possession relative to the transfer of the Municipal Loan Fund Debentures from the Municipality of Wolford to the Town of Peterborough.

Please to enclose them in an envelope to my address and drop it in the Post Office.

I am, Sir, your obed't servant.

J. EDWARDS,
Clerk of the Mun. of Peterborough.

PETERBORO', 21st June, 1858.

SIR,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 17th inst., in which you say you have been instructed by the Council to call upon me for all papers in my possession relative to the transfer of the Municipal Loan Fund Debentures from the Municipality of Wolford to the Town of Peterboro'.

In reply I have to state, that I have no papers—nor have I ever had any—connected with that transaction, except those already exhibited to the Mayor, Councillors and Auditors,—which papers are still in my possession, and after the very unfair attempt to fix a charge of embezzlement upon me,—will remain there. I shall nevertheless be happy to shew them to any member of the Council who may desire to see them,—or if called upon by the Council, give testimony on the subject.

Your obdt. servt,

JAMES EDWARDS, Esq.,
Clerk T. C. Peterboro'.

Yet Mr. Conger tells the House he is not aware that any action has been taken by the Council. That is something more than equivocation; but what shall be said of the conduct of an agent refusing to give up the papers that are felt important towards obtaining justice against their debtor. Mr. Conger will exhibit them to any member of the Council, or, if called upon, give testimony; but, as to assisting the people to recover their stolen property, he cannot think of it. That is not the way to establish one's own innocence, but it is an excellent way of sheltering a wrongdoer from public vengeance. However. Mr. Conger, of course, knows the price he does it at. Some of Mr. Conger's friends deny that he ever stated that the Government claimed back interest upon the Wolford debentures. Here is Mr. Conger's statement published at the time:

To the Editor of the Review.

DEAR SIR,—On my return to Town yesterday, I learned that Mr. Brown, the senior member for Toronto, had in a speech of his delivered a few days before, charged the ministry with issuing £25,000 of Municipal Loan Fund Debentures, contrary to law, for the purpose of buying up the electors of the County.

A simple relation of the facts, which I give below, will shew the utter absurdity of such a charge.

Some time in the month of September last, the Town of Peterborough—not the County—determined to subscribe for £30,000 stock in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway, to enable that Company to build a branch of their road to Peterboro'. Soon after the passing of the By-law, it was discovered that Municipal debentures were unsaleable, and that money must be obtained by some other means or the work stop. Having incidentally heard that the Township of Wolford, had some 18 months before received £25,000 sterling, of Municipal Loan Fund Debentures, which they had not used, I at once made enquiry, and found they were willing to surrender them upon being relieved from all responsibility; to this proposition I agreed, provided the Government would consent to the change of security.

A By-Law therefore was introduced into the Town Council of Peterboro', passed, and ratified by the people, and the consent of the Government obtained for the change of security. The Municipality of Wolford in the meantime passed resolutions authorizing their Reeve to surrender the Debentures, and take up their By-Law, which was done on the 26th of October, and on the next day the Debentures were handed over to me, it will thus be seen that the Government had no control over these Debentures, and really nothing to do in the matter except consenting to the exchange of security. As to the bonus paid by Peterborough, it should be remembered that at the time of the surrender of these debentures, the Municipality of Wolford were in arrears to the Government for something more than £1500 sterling, for interest, sinking fund, &c., &c., which they were not willing to lose.

I am, dear sir,
Your obedient servant,
W. S. CONGER.

Will the Review please explain it?

Mr. Whitmarsh, too, Mr. Conger's dear friend and pal, sends us a curious bit of correspondence:

MERRICKVILLE, 28th June, 1858.

DEAR SIR,—I saw an extract from your paper a short time ago relating to the Wolford Debentures, which leads me to suppose that you take an interest in the affair.

I therefore take the liberty of enclosing to you a copy of a Resolution of the Wolford Township Council, passed on Saturday the 26th inst., which expresses the feelings of the Municipality.

I am, dear sir, your obdt. servt.,
E. H. WHITMARSH.
EDITOR OF THE "EXAMINER," Peterboro.

COPY OF RESOLUTION.

Mr. Welton moves, seconded by Mr. Kirkland,—That the late Council having pass a Resolution, authorizing Mr. Whitmarsh to return the £25,000, currency, Municipal Loan Fund Debentures to the Government, with the understanding that the Municipality should be relieved from all liability regarding the same, has been carried out to the satisfaction of this Council. And they deserve the confidence of the Electors for so doing,—and also, Mr. Whitmarsh is justly entitled to the approbation of the Township for effecting so satisfactory an arrangement.

Carried 26th June, 1858, and certified by the Clerk.

Satisfactory arrangement! If a bare surrender was held satisfactory why is Peterborough to give a bonus of £1500 sterling?

We have looked over the minutes of the Council, with the anticipation of seeing a copy of the instruction understood to be intended for Mr. Mowat, but find none. It will be just as we foretold, a good deal of pretended indignation, an appearance of earnestness, and, by and by, no more about it. That is the ordinary proceeding of the town Council of Peterborough. The Review in his notice of the resolutions in Council reports that a suit in Chancery was decided upon, for the recovery of the £1500 from Mr. Whitmarsh. This is not true, Mr. Whitmarsh is not named in the resolution, nor ought he to be, the Town of Peterboro' knows only their agent in the matter, Mr. Conger; he is the man who must be held to have the money, until he shows that he paid it rightfully. He volunteered his services, and he must now account.

Mr. Brown Is Not a Defaulter: Treasurer.

Disgraceful scenes continue to be a standing order in the House of Assembly. The reported accusation of Mr. Powell of Carleton against Mr. George Brown, in a matter as irrelevant as impertinent and unfounded, is given in our synopsis of parliamentary proceedings, along with the manly and feeling refutation of the charge by Mr. Brown. It is astonishing that a political opponent should so far forget himself as did Mr. Powell, and it is equally astonishing that the Attorney General, in whose interest the attack was intended, should sit quietly by, and allow the outrage to pass unrebuked. Mr. Macdonald and his government may be assured that the country, removed from the exciting scene, regarding it from an unimpassioned point of view, feels deeply the degrading reflection which such ruffianism fastens upon its legislature, and may yet, when it has an opportunity, hold the abettors, as well as the principals, to a strict account. We are happy that Mr. Brown has, with that one effort, for ever silenced the malignant aspersions upon his private character, which have so often and so maliciously been whispered against it. His miserable traducer, unknown to fame, except as a base moral assassin, is welcome to the reflection of his own dastardly inspirations.

Mr. McGee.

Mr. McGee, having made himself remarkable by a display of exceeding power of oratory in the House of Assembly, and thereby gained himself the first rank among the public men of the country, becomes, as a matter of course, an object of aversion to those who have not the benefit of his talent on their side. The higher and more sensible portion of his opponents pass deserved encomiums upon his attainments, and congratulate the country upon its good fortune in possessing so great a character, but little people, like the editor of the Peterborough Review, run up and bark, and as the giant intellect refuses to be dis urbed by their manifestations, they flatter themselves in the performance; but if they could only feel the contempt they are held in, their labor would be soon ended. Mr. McGee has devoted himself to the service of his country, and may look forward to no distant day, when even the little curs will do him homage. If he could be induced to appear, in his admired character of a historical lecturer, before a Peterborough audience, he would soon discover the real sentiment of this section towards him, and how much it has been belied by his puny assailant of the Review.

Rev. Mr. Young's Lecture.

Mr. Young, a colored preacher, advertised that he would give a lecture on "Liberty" in the Town Hall, last night. A small but respectable audience met the lecturer, and from their sympathetic expressions, appeared to be impressed favorably with his claims upon public sentiment. As one of the number, we readily accord to Mr. Young a high order of intellectual power, and heartily recommend his labors, as being worthy of the support of a liberty-loving and liberty-granting community. That the lecturer was not encouraged by the presence of a larger audience, is not to be charged as his fault, and neither, we would fain hope, was it to be attributed to any absence of sympathy with the weak, who struggle almost against hope for the dearest object of life.

Fatal Accident—Caution to Bathers

On Sunday forenoon, a young man named William Stubbs, while bathing in the Otonabee, above Dickson's-Hill, incautiously plunged into the current, which here runs very rapid, and not being a powerful swimmer, he was unfortunately borne down, being utterly unequable of resisting the strong force of the stream. A young man who was with him instantly gave the alarm, but succour arrived too late to be of any use to the unfortunate bather. He had disappeared, and search was immediately commenced for his body, and continued without interruption till dusk, after which a pine fire was lit and a close examination of the river made but without success. In the morning the search was again resumed at the same place, but was soon rendered unnecessary, by the body being observed floating in the Little Lake, the great bend of the water having produced this effect much sooner than anticipated. The body was immediately recovered and conveyed into town, and was interred on Tuesday morning in the Wesleyan Cemetery.

Bathers cannot be too cautious in going into the Otonabee, it requires a strong and expert swimmer to breast its powerful current, and none should risk their lives until experience has proved the danger can be counterbalanced by skill and power.

Mr. Macdonald's Municipal Bill.

There is no subject in the Statute Book, upon which an enquirer feels more confusion, than that which relates to our Municipal Institutions, while it ought to be the one of all others the most easy of comprehension, because the parties who have to refer for guidance to Statutes, in matters relating to municipal laws, are seldom of a class which is familiar with the workings of the written law. Nor can it be otherwise expected of men who are selected to carry out their provisions, almost entirely on account of their practical connection with the wants of their municipality, and but little from their presumed acquaintance with the forms which the Legislature has set round the municipal office. As a remedy for the distracted confusion of this branch of jurisprudence, where every reference seems almost to contradict, or at least renders obscure, the other, Mr. Attorney General Macdonald, in the early part of the present session, introduced a Bill, which was then referred to a select committee, and is now reprinted with amendments. The Bill is necessarily of great length, but it has the great advantage of being an undivided declaration of the municipal law. The intention is to give it force on the first day of December next, so as that the elections may be held under it in January; it will therefore be interesting to the country, to know something of its character, in anticipation of those events. No change is to be made in the corporate form of existing institutions. The County Council has power, on the petition of any of the inhabitants of an unincorporated village, within the County, to erect the same into a Police Village. When an unincorporated village has over seven hundred and fifty inhabitants, upon a petition of not less than one hundred freeholders, the County Council shall erect the village into an Incorporated Village, apart from the township. When it appears by the census return, that an incorporated village contains over three thousand inhabitants, the village may be erected into a Town; and when in the same way a town is found to contain over fifteen thousand inhabitants, it may be erected into a City. One of the most valuable provisions of the new law is that requiring that the mayor of a city or town shall be chosen by the electors, at the same time as the aldermen and councilmen in cities, and councillors in towns, which shall be on the first Monday in January. This is a reform that was long needed, for, while a mayor had to owe his election to a clique in the Council, few men of spirit would condescend to fill the office, and, he who did accept it, could not persuade himself that he was much complimented in it. His position was consequently confined, and he felt himself more the chairman of the Council, than the chief magistrate of the municipality. The Bill evidences a great deal of labor in its compilation, and will entitle Mr. Macdonald to the gratitude of all who have to refer to the law in municipal questions. We hope his labor will not be in vain, and that next year will inaugurate the new and correct system of direct contact between the mayor and the municipal electors.

The editor of the Review tells his readers he has ventured by water, from Mud Lake to Lindsay, but is compelled, for want of space, an old-standing complaint, to omit a description of his journey. He feels it proper, however, he says, to say a word about the boats, and then like a thorough snob, always aping the manners and and flattering the vanity of a gingerbread aristocracy, he reports that the cabin of the Ogemah has crimson and gold paper, the windows nicely curtained and the seats nicely cushioned, and covered with crimson plush. Possibly it did not occur to the western traveller, that the people he addressed were not so much concerned in the absurd folly of decorating a steamboat on the back lakes with crimson and gold, as the infatuated proprietor; what the public take an interest in is the character of the country, the quality of the navigation, and the use it is put to. The people who are passing on that route care little for the privilege of a seat upon crimson plush; they would prefer to see that the expenditure on the steamboats navigating the back waters was in keeping with the character of the trade they were to do, because, without that, there is no certainty of their continuance, beyond the power of their owner to keep them up. The back lakes are full of suggestive lessons in this respect, and had the western traveller an eye to the demands of his readers, he might have gone over a long and melancholy list of unfortunate failures by just such empty vanity as he recounts of the Ogemah. Of all the settlers with ample means who went to that back country, there is hardly a representative left; the tale of one is the story of the whole. Seeking seclusion from open intercourse with the despised inhabitants of a country they would reclaim with their superior skill and management, they set to work to carry out their grand designs; and as they started with the intention of astonishing the natives, so they ended with a sublime lesson to themselves. Everything they did was overdone, and the Ogemah, with her crimson plush, however acceptable to the posterior of the western traveller, is a perfect type of the other doings of that class of settlers on the back lakes. She may continue to run, as long as a little fortune is set apart for her support, but the moment she tries to stand alone, she will be about as flat as the Peterborough Review.

Sudden Death.

Dr. Tennens, a medical practitioner lately become resident in Peterborough, was seized with a attack of illness, on Saturday night, which speedily ended his existence. The doctor had gone to rest, at his rooms at McGregor's Hotel, from which unusual sounds, were then heard to proceed, and upon entering it, his condition at once revealed itself. He made no manifestation of consciousness, and the remedies applied to him were unavailing. An inquest was held upon his body, and the jury found, under medical testimony, that the deceased died in a fit of apoplexy.

Dreadful and Fatal Accident.

A brakesman on the Cobourg and Peterborough Railroad, named George Bowers, met with an accident on Friday last, which caused his death in a most distressing manner; the end car of a freight train having run over him. The train had just left the Peterborough station, at 9 P. M., when he, in attempting to pass from one car to another, lost his footing; fell on the track, and was run over; the car wheels stripping the flesh from the left arm and shoulder, breaking the collar bone and several ribs, and cutting off the left foot. The poor fellow was discovered on the track, and removed to Dytchers tavern, when every assistance that could be got was rendered, but the injuries being evidently of a fatal character, no operation was attempted. The sufferer, however, was so solicitous to be operated upon, that his attendants undertook his removal to Toronto. After arriving there, he was conducted to the hospital, and had his leg and arm taken off, when he seemed to bear up against the shock his system had sustained, but on the following morning, Sunday, he was dead. The unfortunate sufferer was about twenty-five years of age, had a wife and four children in England, and had been himself but a few months in Canada. During that time he had been employed on the Cobourg road, and had gained the confidence of his superiors, and the friendship of every one about him. The dreadful nature of the injuries left the poor man no hope of recovery, from the time he received them, but his fortitude and resignation were most strongly expressed to those around him; his only regret being for the helpless condition of his dependant wife and children. We are happy to understand that a liberal subscription is intended to be raised in their behalf; a determination, which, when told to the dying man, seemed to be the most soothing balm that could be applied to his pitiable state. Now that nature has ended her course in him, nothing could be more fitting than that those who felt with him, should turn their humane attention towards his bereaved family, who, while he lived, depended upon him for their support; be labored in toil, that others might live in comfort, and those years of labor are as the payments upon an Assurance Policy. It is refreshing to feel that liberal persons recognize that policy as due to his survivors. What a consolation would it not be if a life of labor could always ensure that peace of mind which attends the assurance that the beloved who are left on earth, shall not suffer in their personal comforts, by the removal of their natural protector.

The Circus.

Saturday, as announced by flaming placards, brought in an equestrian troupe, but not up to the complement advertised; and the highly wrought descriptions of the promised entertainment gathered into the town a very large concourse of people from the country. There was a noon and an evening exhibition, both of which were witnessed by impenetrable masses. We have not a word to say against the pleasure that people feel upon witnessing the extravagant caricatures of the human family, or the extraordinary activity, strength, and elasticity of stage performers; on the contrary, we partake heartily of the enjoyment, and encourage the gratification upon every opportunity, in the full conviction that to relax occasionally from the severe discipline imposed by the business of the day, is to enable the subject the better to perform his task; but it seems incomprehensible that exhibitions, in which the perfection of man's physical development are displayed, should be so surrounded with questionable moral accompaniments, as must needs offend the taste, and insult the virtue, of refined natures. Yet it is undeniable, that at these exhibitions, a studied purpose is constantly made manifest, to pander to the low standard of taste among the least cultivated of their patrons, so much so that any female could be excused from the slightest imputation of false modesty, who should refuse to sanction such coarseness by her countenance. If ladies would deny themselves a pleasure, which, under the circumstances, cannot be unmixed with pain, it would soon be felt necessary to correct the abuses which are too plain to be past unobserved, and the circus, as the theatre, would become an innocent recreation, and an accepted resort.

Arrival of the "Ariel" and "Anglo Saxon"

ST. JOHNS, N. F., June 26.

The Vanderbilt ship Ariel, Captain Ludlow, from Bremer, via Southampton, on the 16th instant, passed Cape Race at 4 P.M. yesterday, the 25th. She was intercepted off the Cape by the news yacht of the New York Associated Press which arrived here to-day with a synopsis of her news.

The Paris Moniteur denies explicitly that any extraordinary preparations for war are making in France.

The screw steamship New York, which sailed from Glasgow for New York on the 12th inst., was wrecked on the same day off the Scottish coast. The passengers and crew were all saved.

General Espinasse, who was appointed Minister of the Interior, with the functions of Minister of Police, immediately after the explosion of the Orsini conspiracy, had, as had been anticipated, resigned, receiving in exchange for his office a seat in the Senate. M. Delangle has been appointed Minister of the Interior.

The Canton of Geneva protests against the expulsion of refugees in Switzerland, and demands that no expulsion shall take place

The Norfolk, from Australia, with £1,000,000 in gold, was spoken outside the channel, and would arrive in a few days. About £1,000,000 is known to be on the way from Australia.

The Times, containing the article on French armaments, was stopped in France.

A submarine cable between Reggio and Messina had been successfully submerged

The Emperor of Russia has invited the French Ambassador to accompany him on his journey in the Southern Provinces of the Empire.

The United States steam frigate Powhattan was at Hong Kong. It was rumoured at Canton that the Chinese intend to destroy the European dwellings on the Honan side of the river. It is also reported that Nankin had been captured from the rebels by the imperial troops.

LIVERPOOL, June 16.

The accounts from the United States, per steamship Niagara, had a depressing effect upon our cotton market, and under their influence, prices have slightly declined for all descriptions. The decline is generally called ¼ per lb. The market has also been quite flat, the sale of the three days only reaching 14,000 bales, and of which 1,000 each was sold to speculators and exporters.

The Manchester market has sympathized with that of Liverpool, and the accounts therefrom are unpromising, sales having been effected at a slight decline on all descriptions of goods.

LIVERPOOL BREADSTUFFS.—Our market has generally been lifeless. Messrs. Richardson, Spence & Co. report the weather favourable for crops. Flour remained steady at the last quotations; sales are of a quite unimportant character. Western Canal 30s to 32s; Philadelphia and Baltimore 29s to 31s 6d; Ohio 31s 6d to 32s. Wheat Supplies and sales continually unchanged, except inferior red, which is 2d lower; red Western 8s 3d to 8s 6d; white Southern 9s to 9s 2d. Corn quiet at the quotations given about per Persia. Yellow 34s 6d to 34s 9d; white 32s to 32s 6d.

Quebec, June 28, 1858.

The Anglo-Saxon, from Liverpool on the 16th of the 18th, arrived here at 10 o'clock yesterday morning. She came through the straits of Belleisle, and experts meeting a great deal of ice.—The Polish arrived at Southampton on the 13th. The Edinburgh arrived at Glasgow on the same day. Niagara reached Liverpool on the 17th. The New York went ashore on the 16th of June in a dense fog on the night of the 15th She is said to be breaking up.

In the House of Commons, Lord Stanley read a letter showing that pacification in Oude was proceeding very satisfactorily, Land-holders and Talookdars giving in their submission. The debate was resumed on the resolutions relative to the Government of India. Lord Stanley moved the fifth resolution which provides that part of the Council shall be elected by holders of India stock. Lord John Russell moved in amendment that the Council be appointed entirely by the Queen. After the debate, the amendment was rejected by sixty-five of a majority, and the original proposition carried.

In the Lords, Lord Malmesbury apprehended not the slightest difficulty in the assembling of the fleet sufficient to defend the Channel at the shortest notice.

Lord Fitzgerald explained the settlement of the Oughtart affair, and said that the Sardinian representative in London expressed his satisfaction at the result.

The London Times contains an argument in favour of acceding in regard to searching vessels, and the discontinuance of the practice.

Queen Victoria was on a visit to Warwickshire, for the purpose of inaugurating the public park and museum at Birmingham.

FRANCE.

The Moniteur denies the assertions of English papers, that France was making great warlike preparations, and says, that the naval and military establishment for the year, has not been increased. The denial produced a favourable effect on the Paris Bourse, but was imperative in England; the belief being that the Moniteur was not explicit enough.

A letter from Paris asserts that it is notorious that the Mediterranean squadron has recently been augmented from 8 to 12 vessels; that forty thousand extra recruits were called out this Spring, and that immense armaments far beyond what the defence of the country requires are going on not only at Cherbourg, but at every military post of the Empire. Said, also, that the Russian representative at the Paris Conferences was creating difficulties which threaten to prolong the meetings 2 or 3 months. The principle of the non-union of the Principalities had been admitted in Conference. An extraordinary meeting of the Conference had been held.

The French infantry regiments are to be armed with rifles, and orders have been issued for 400,000.

ITALY.

Satisfaction has been granted by the King of Naples to the demands of England, which was regarded in Paris as precursor to the resumption of diplomatic relations between Naples and the Western Powers.

TURKEY.

The attack on the English consul at Belgrade, previously reported, is said to have taken a more serious turn, some soldiers having subsequently attacked his house. They were repulsed by the Servian Guard sent to his assistance.

INDIA.

Nothing later, but the official despatch to the Indian Company gives full details of news per Persia. The garrison at Singehanpore, had been relieved by Brigadier Jones. The rebels had stormed and retaken Phundee, which had left in charge of Scindia's troops. The rebels also seized Fullutpore and Thulbut.

GOVERNOR'S PROCLAMATION.

By His Excellency James Douglas, Governor and Commander in Chief of the Colony of Vancouver Island and its dependencies, and Vice Admiral of the same:—

Whereas, It is commonly reported that certain boats and other vessels have entered Fraser River for trade, and whereas there is reason to apprehend that other persons are preparing and fitting out boats and vessels for the same purpose—

Now, therefore, I have issued this, my proclamation, warning all persons that such acts are contrary to the law and infringements upon the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, who are legally entitled to the trade with Indians in the British possessions on the Northwest coast of America, to the exclusion of all other persons, whether British or foreign.

And also that after 14 days from the date of this my proclamation, all ships boats and vessels together with the goods laden on board, found in Fraser River, or in any of the bays, rivers or creeks of the said British possessions on the Northwest Coast of America, not having a license from the Hudson's Bay Company and a sufference from the proper officer of customs at Victoria, shall be liable to forfeiture and will be seized and condemned according to law.

Given under my hand and seal of Government House, Victoria, this 8th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1858, and in the 21st year of Her Majesty's reign.

JAMES DOUGLAS, Governor.

By His Excellency's command,
RICHARD COLLEDGE, Secretary.

Important Legal Decision Under the Passengers' Act, 1856.

On Friday last, a complaint was presented to Mr. Sheriff Bell, at the instance of Captain Frere, emigration officer in Glasgow, against Mr. D. A. B. Murray, shipping agent, for having committed a breach of a contract ticket issued by him to Jessie McKay, whereby he had become bound to provide her with a steerage passage to Montreal by the ship Sunbeam, and, notwithstanding thereof, had refused to furnish her with such a passage. Mr. Gemmel, Procurator Fiscal, appeared on behalf of the complainer, and Mr. G. Smith for defendant. It appeared that on the 19th May current, Jessie McKay had engaged from Mr. Murray a steerage passage to Montreal for herself, and also another for an acquaintance named Elizabeth McDonald. By the 71st section of the act, "every person who shall receive money from any person for or in respect of a passage in any ship, shall give to the person paying such money a contract ticket signed by the owner, charterer, &c., or by some person in their or his behalf." It is further provided that such contract shall be in the form contained in a schedule appended to the act, and that the directions printed on said schedule shall be obeyed in the same manner as if set forth in the act. The first direction in the schedule is, "that a contract ticket must be given to every passenger engaging a passage from the United Kingdom to any place out of Europe, in the present case Mr. Murray had issued only one contract ticket, by which he engaged that the persons named on the margin thereof, namely, McKay and McDonald, would be provided with a steerage passage to Montreal in the Sunbeam. The contract ticket was, otherwise, in terms of the schedule of the Act, but there being only one contract ticket the passage money for both was stumped, as also the deposit money, paid on account thereof. After her passage had been taken out, McDonald refused to go to Montreal, and on this being intimated to Mr. Murray, he refused to take McKay, unless the passage money for both, as stumped in the contract ticket, was paid by her. Mr. Smith, on behalf of Mr. Murray, admitted the facts as stated by Mr. Gemmel, and after the agents for the parties had been heard on the legal interpretation to be given to the contract ticket, the Sheriff found that the defendant was bound to take McKay on payment of her own passage money, notwithstanding of McDonald's failure. The Sheriff stated that he was clearly of opinion (1) that although one contract had been issued it must be interpreted as containing a separate and distinct contract with each of the persons named on the margin of the ticket, and consequently that the provisions therein be enforced at the instance of each of the parties, irrespective altogether of the other; (2) that on a proper construction of the Act Mr. Murray was not entitled to include McKay and McDonald in the same contract, but was bound to have furnished a separate contract ticket to each. The complaint was accordingly found proved; but as Mr. Murray had at the outset of the proceedings agreed to furnish McKay a passage in the Sunbeam on payment of her own money of the passage money, whatever decision might be come, the Sheriff decerned for a nominal value of 5s. together with the costs of the prosecution. —Glasgow Mail.

HALIFAX, June 28.

The Arabia from Liverpool of the 19th inst., arrived this evening. She passed the Africa on the 19th, bound east and on the 23rd at noon she passed a ship of war, supposed to be one of the Telegraph Expedition steering west, in lat. 53-36, long 30-08 possibly Niagara from her position. It would appear that the spot for uniting the cable had not yet been reached.

The Indian Empire was to have left Galway on the 18th inst., but as she was entering that harbour, she struck a sunken rock which though not injuring her, caused her detention until the 19th.

London breadstuffs dull. English wheat is 2s lower; American unchanged. Consols closed at 95¾ for account. Bullion in the Bank of England had decreased £101,000.

In the House of Lords on the 17th, the Bishop of Oxford called attention to the Spanish Slave Trade. He contended that the present threatening affairs in the West was occasioned by having so long permitted Spain to break her treaty engagements.—Lord Brougham strongly opposed the policy of Spain. Earl Malmesbury deeply regretted that the efforts of England to suppress the Slave Trade had not been seconded by other nations. He had admitted to the American Government that, as a question of international law, England was not entitled to insist upon the right of visit or search, but he should also put the question strongly to the American Government whether they would continue to permit their flag to be prostituted to the worst of purposes, and had urged the necessity of an ocean police, and that some understanding should be come to different maritime nations which would enable nationality of vessels to be clearly verified without any danger of a breach of international laws. He had every reason to believe, from a conversation with the American Minister, that some such arrangements will be come to. With regard to Spain, it was notorious that hitherto the moral support of England had materially aided her in resisting the wishes of the United States to annex Cuba; but if she still persisted in supporting the Slave Trade, it was highly probable that the present anxiety of Great Britain would be exchanged for indifference. Earls Grey and Aberdeen assented to Lord Malmesbury's definition of international law.

Commercial Matters.

TORONTO, Tuesday, June 29.

We have no new feature to observe in the trade of the city. In groceries and produce there is a little more doing, which together with the fine weather, and symptoms of a slight improvement in trade, cause a better feeling to be evinced in commercial circles. A number of wholesale houses have dispatched their buyers to Europe to make the fall purchases, but the universal instructions to them is to buy sparingly. Light, but well-assorted stocks will probably be imported during the fall, but there are none among our merchants who are sufficiently venturesome to purchase largely. Our market for merchandize of all descriptions has been well nigh bare throughout the past and present season, and no doubt the city has lost trade thereby, yet our merchants have acted wisely in curtailing their operations, and devoting their attention more to the collection and settlement of outstanding affairs, rather than to the pushing of business and increasing indebtedness. The fall trade must necessarily be small, yet from vast experience, it will likely be of a healthy character. Should the farmers bring out their wheat early, and be able to get money for it, we may have a slight revival of trade in the fall;—for every day strengthens the impression that our commercial affairs are in a most unsound condition, and that a plentitude of money, and a prosperity like that we have been enjoying, is very far in the distance.

To make trade matters yet more unsatisfactory, we have had during the week some startling revelations as to management and disposal of the Provincial funds, and questions of very grave importance have been discussed in the Legislature. A deficiency in the receipts and expenditure of last year, amounting to $3,400,000, has resulted in bringing forth a proposal from the Inspector General to impose some new taxes on the people to raise money to provide for any deficiency this year. An excise duty is proposed to be levied on the manufacture of whiskey and malt liquors, and on all sea-going vessels. To the first, the principal objection urged is the expense which the collection of the tax will necessitate and the amount of patronage that is placed in the hands of the Government. Against the last proposal, however, there are many objections.—The shipping interest was never more depressed than at present; and with but a very slight prospect of improvement, it is hard that a new tax should be imposed upon them, and their expenses and difficulties just so much increased.—The high rates of freight have always been the objection to the St. Lawrence as an outlet to the trade of the Western country, and this alone, with the danger of navigation for want of Lighthouses, has prevented Quebec and Eastern ports from competing with New York and Boston, for a portion of the trade of this continent. And now, when thousands of pounds have been expended in erecting Lighthouses and improving navigation, and when there begins to be attention directed to this route and its wonderful advantages demonstrated, in steps Mr. Cayley and proposes to burthen this young and sickly trade with a tax, to pay the needless and most extravagances of the Government. To compensate for the bungling and short-sighted policy of our financial minister, the trade that will do most for the Province—the channel through which the commerce of the Western world should flow—the most wonderful chain of navigation in the world—is to be injured and pestered with a tax however small an amount—yet a tax sufficient to deal a severe blow to the business, and bring to nought the work of years, and the expenditure of thousands.

It reminds one of the caprice of children—one erecting with anxious care a stately pile of toys and his companion knocking it down, with a single stroke, without a thought or care of what labour and patience it cost. Surely there is some strange fatality attached to our Inspector General. Though a lamentable error has been entrapped with the most material interests of the Province, and no matter in what direction he moves, there is sure to follow confusion and ruin. Years ago, the country underwent the same experience from his management; and never the developments of the past few days exhibit it a state of affairs sufficient to alarm every man interested in the country. The course the Inspector General has taken with reference to the amendment of the tariff is a most singular one, and insufficient in itself to create a feeling of contempt at the indistence and ignorance displayed. It would be pardonable to interfere with the tariff to provide for the due necessities of the Government; but to commence tinkering this most important and delicate matter, at the present time, for the purpose of affording incidental protection and equalizing the taxes of the rich and poor, is beyond bearing. Mr. Cayley does not avow it as his intention to raise the charges on the importations as a whole, and to stipulate that the revenue derivable from Customs this year will be equal to the last.—In other words that our merchants will import as much in 1858 as they did in 1857. How widely he errs in his judgment, and what a calamitous ignorance spoils a proficient ovinion, to make that contract to fall short of the revenue of last year by a large amount, will be seen by the sequel. [illegible] Cayley on this [illegible] Government changes, and Mr. Cayley's ridiculous assertions to be contradicted, we should not be surprised to see the new tariff emanating many important changes, chiefly with the view of increasing the revenue. The idea of meddling with the tariff just now to effect a few unimportant changes would be absurd, was there not some hidden motive beneath the movement. In the meantime merchants can act to a limited [illegible] until some definite announcement is made. The present is the month when some of the fall purchases are made, and nearly all our houses have agents in England awaiting orders, which will in all probability be greatly governed by the alterations in the Tariff. In justice to the important interests, some immediate action ought to be taken, and the suspense put an end to. Among commercial circles during the week there has been a good deal of discussion on these and other important points, and we are certain we speak the sentiments of the mercantile community in expressing the most unqualified disapprobation of Mr. Cayley, his financial mismanagement, and unsettled commercial policy. Indeed, the whole ministry come in for severe condemnation, and our merchants cannot but repudiate the influences which enable the present Cabinet to keep their places, and to deny to Upper Canada the laws, she requires and the improvements she demands in the administration of Government.

The weather for the week has been all that could be desired, and a bountiful change for the better has taken place throughout the country. There seems now to be but little doubt but that an average yield will be secured of all cereals.

Toronto Markets.

TORONTO, June 29.

There continues to be a moderate supply of produce in the market, and with good demand and steady prices, all products of the farm move off freely.

WHEAT—Yesterday the market was hardly so buoyant, but prices in the main were unchanged, the range sale extending from 4s to 5s per bushel. The figures most frequently paid were 4s 4d a 4s 8d, and the average for the day could not have been less than 4s per bushel.

FLOUR—There continues to be an active enquiry for flour, and the market is becoming bare. Prices, however, do not show signs of improvement, and we still have to quote superfine at $3 66 a $3 75; Fancy, $3 90 a $4; Extra, $4 15 a $4 30 per barrel.

RYE—2s 9d a 3s, and wanted.

OATS are still scarce at 1s 5d a 1s 10½d.

PEAS—In good demand at 2s 7d a 2s 9d.

POTATOES are selling at all prices, between 2s 6d and 3s 3d per bushel.

STRAWBERRIES, by wholesale, 18 to 20 cents per quart.

BEEF—$5½ a $6½. Sheep, $4 a $5. Calves, $3 a $5. Lambs, $2 a $3.

WOOL—1s a 1s 1½d per lb. Sheepskins, with wool, 6s 3d. Pelts, 1s 3d. Calfskins, 6d per lb. Beef Hides, $5 per 100 lbs.

Special Correspondence San Francisco Bulletin.

FORT LANGLEY, Frazer River, }
Tuesday, May 25, 1858. }

Since I last wrote, on the 11th inst., I have been up Fort Yale as far as it was possible to get up in a canoe. I left Fort Hope on the 12th, and arrived at Hill's Bar, one mile below Fort Yale, and 15 miles from Fort Hope, by noon. This bar is about 500 miles in length, and about sixty men were working on it, the claims being each 25 feet front. The river from Fort Hope to Fort Yale presents no difficulties whatever to a canoe ascending, except in one place, where there is a rapid, which, however, is no great obstacle, as close to the shore, in the eddy, a canoe is easily towed past it. But, about one half mile above Fort Yale, the river finds its passage between huge rocks—the sides almost perpendicular—and a canoe cannot be taken any further. From thence all goods have to be packed. Now and then a stretch of a mile or so is found, where the canoe can be of service. Some 200 Indians, with their squaws, were at work on the bar when I arrived, and they were nowise particular in seizing on the dirt which the miners were digging up for their own washing. The whites were not troubling them, suffering all and trying to promote good feeling with them, although they were annoyed and insulted very much. The morning I arrived two men (Kerrison & Co.) cleaned up 6¼ ounces, from one rocker, the product of half a day's work. Myself and partner staked off two claims, and set to work making rockers; and no boards being on the bar, we had, perforce, to go into the woods and fell and hew out our timber. Kerrison & Co. the next day cleaned up 10¼ ounces, from two rockers, which I saw myself weighed. This bar is acknowledged to be one of the richest ever seen. Old California miners say they never saw so rich diggings. The average result per day to the man was fully twenty dollars—some, much more. The gold is very fine, so much so that it was impossible to save more than two-thirds of what went through the rockers. There was no quicksilver to be had! one man went down to Fort Langley and bought one pound, paying $15 for it. Numbers of canoes were arriving every day; and by the time I left to come down here, they were scattered all along the river, from Fort Yale to Fort Hope. The river was rising steadily, at the rate of about a foot a day; and when I left, on the 23rd, the bars were nearly covered with water. By this time all river mining must have ceased. The miners were building cabins, &c., when I left. Rocker irons were in great demand, but few having brought them with them. Nails brought from $1 to $1 50 a pound. One lot of a dozen pounds brought $3—or two bits a nail. A few days before, a canoe arrived, bringing a small supply. A trader came up with a lot of provisions, and three barrels of whiskey, and one of brandy, and in ten minutes afterwards the bar was in commotion. He drew his revolver on some drunken Indians, who were at his tent, and instantly the Indians ran to their tents and brought out their muskets, and things looked very serious for a few moments; not a miner offered to go to the trader's help, however, but one of a party of boatmen from San Francisco, who are working claims here, walked up with an axe over his arm, and another rolled out the casks, whilst he smashed their heads in—an operation which met with the unanimous approval of all the white men at the bar. The miners called a meeting and passed some laws. One of these laws prohibited any liquor at all going on the bar, and any person found either selling or giving the Indians any, was to not only forfeit all his goods claim—if he had one—but be sent down the river in a canoe without any paddles. The man's name was Patsey—something, I forget what; but he certainly deserved great credit for his nerve, to do what he did in the midst of a crowd of excited Indians, maddened with liquor and armed to the teeth.

At "Sailor Diggings," above Fort Yale, they are doing very well, averaging from $8 to $25 per day to the man. The water was rising fast on them, however; and they must soon be at a stand still. From the best authority I could get, I find that the river will be at its height about the middle of June—say the 20th—and about the 15th of July will commence falling. Flour was selling at $100 per bbl., or $50 a hundred at Sailor Diggings. It was selling for $65 at Hill's Bar when I was there. Bacon was $1 per lb. At Fort Hope there was nothing but dried salmon at a bit a piece, a little flour, and some tea for sale. I left Fort Yale after breakfast, and arrived here, stopping at Fort Hope on the way, before sundown. It took me five days to go up the river over the same ground, so you can form some idea of the current. Here I found the Company's steamer Otter at anchor, which had arrived from Victoria a few days ago, with the launch of the war steamer Satellite astern armed with a brass 12-pounder, and manned with a crew of some thirty mariners and sailors, with lots of rifles, &c. I also learned that the Satellite was anchored off the mouth of the river, and no goods or provisions were allowed to enter the river for the purpose of trading. Miners were free to go and come with their tools and provisions only. Gov. Douglas was here and some of the directors of the Company. Some 100 men were camped on the beach, and more continually arriving. A Scotchman from the Sound had opened a "Miner's Home," in a log cabin; and the fare he offered really would have done no disredit to a first-class restaurant. The miners were in great consternation about a proclamation which appeared on the gates of the Fort, a copy of which I enclose to you, prohibiting the bringing of any goods, or, in fact, attempting in any way to trade on this river, or in this territory. The Hudson's Bay Company claims the sole right to all trade and jurisdiction over this country, by right of their charter from the English Government, and subsequent acts of Parliament. This clapped a stopper on ten out of eleven persons who were hurrying off to the Sound and Francisco for the purpose of bringing the goods, etc. Their visions of fortune and "piles" were dissolved like snow in warm water; and the long faces on the beach suggested to one not knowing the cause, the idea of their having heard of the demise of some near relative or dear friend. The license to work in the diggings is to be $5 per month; but will not be demanded, I believe, until the Company are enabled to give the miners some protection in return, either through soldiers, whose arrival, it is rumoured, is daily expected on the Havana, a British ship-of-war, or through a local police. The Governor is about starting off to visit the mining regions. He has been visited by great numbers of the miners, and has, so far as I can learn from them, evinced every desire to supply the mines immediately with goods and provisions, whilst he has determined to enforce the rights of the Company. It is understood that the Company will send immediate supplies up, and will furnish them to the miners at reasonable rates. I have been informed by a friend in the Company's service, that arrangements have been nearly concluded with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, to run a line of steamers to Victoria, V. I., from San Francisco—the Hudson's Bay Company to have control of the line, so far that only their freight is to be brought up in them. Passengers, on their arrival at Victoria, are to be charged $2 a head. The Company intend immediately to place a steamer on from Victoria to the river running up as far as Fort Yuba. One can but imagine what this river and the upper country, for so long the solitary home of the savage, will look like in six months from now! The old English and Scotch employes of the Company seem like so many Van Winkles already—men who have been out here twenty to forty years, and who sometimes have not seen a white man for a year at a time, whom no difficulties or dangers seem to daunt.

The Tariff.

That the proposed Tariff does not meet the views nor satisfy the wishes of the protectionists, is abundantly proved by the course taken in reference thereto by Mr. Isaac Buchanan, the chief representative of that party. We understand that the honourable gentleman addressed a letter yesterday morning (2nd inst.,) to the Attorney General, informing him that he would not continue the support he had hitherto given to the Government, while Mr. Cayley continued to pursue his present policy, and he also issued the following circular to members of the Assembly:—

"HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY, }
July 2, 1858. }

"SIR,—Both among those members who, like myself, are anxious, if possible, to sustain the present ministry, and among those who suppose that a better ministry, as a matter of individuals, could be formed, there are, I believe, a great majority of independent men who view the subject of the ways and means of any Government, and whose principles lead them to insist on Canadian home manufactures being sustained and created. Why, then, should we not unite and force on whatever Government is, or may be, in power, the adoption in Canada of the Tariff of the United States, or so much of it as suits our somewhat different circumstances as a country? There is unparalleled distress in the Province, which, we see, can never be relieved, but by our keeping in the country some portion of the money which we will get from the coming harvest. We are driven, therefore, to look, not altogether to considerations of revenue, but to avoid importing foreign labour, in the shape of commodities, to the greatest possible extent. We must at once hasten to lay the foundation for the introduction from Europe and the United States, into this Province, or within the operation of the currency laws of Canada, of manufacturing capitalists, with their capital, hands, and machinery—this being the only means to create general employment to all classes, and a home market for our agricultural productions. Hosts of such manufacturing capitalists are known to be ready to come to Canada, if they were enabled to do so safely, by the Legislature pledging itself to encourage Canadian industry, in preference to foreign. With a view therefore, to some joint or united action, I propose that members who find it convenient should arrange this afternoon, when the House adjourns at six o'clock, to have a meeting, to talk over such steps as in the circumstances may seem called for.

"I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

"ISAAC BUCHANAN.

"P. S.—I send you herewith a paper which expresses pretty nearly the course (in regard to the reconstruction of the Tariff which is open to us. The following quotation from Mr. J. Fenimore Cooper's 'Residence in France in 1832,' seems to me to represent well the yielding or indecisive policy of the Inspector General:—'When the term juste milieu was used first by the King (Louis Philippe,) and adopted by his followers, La Fayette said in Chamber, that "he very well understood what a juste milieu meant, in any particular case; it meant neither more nor less than the truth, in that particular case; but as to a political party's always taking a middle course, under the pretence of being in a juste milieu, he should like it to a discreet man's laying down the proposition that four and four make eight, and a fool's crying out, 'Sir, you are wrong, four and four make ten;' wherespon, the advocate for the juste milieu system would be obliged to say, 'Gentlemen, you are equally in extreme—four and four make nine!'"

The Rebel Court in India.

Dr. Duff, in a letter to the Edinburgh Witness, writes: During the rebellion we were very much in the dark as to how matters were managed at the headquarters of the enemy. The late trial of the ex-King of Delhi has disclosed much relative to the inner workings of the machine of insurrection, and temporarily restored Mogul sovereignty there. And, since the final capture of Lucknow, we learn that there the rebels set up as their new king a youth of ten years of age, a son of the late king, now a prisoner in Fort William. This youth was of course a mere puppet in the hands of the insurgents; while his mother, a woman of energetic but abandoned character, was Regent, in full charge of all matters of state. One of her paramours, Mummu Khan, whom she made Chief Justice and Chancellor of the Exchequer, was openly acknowledged in that relation to her, wielded in reality supreme power in the rebel state. Among other honors showered on him, the Begum or Queen Mother, as Regent, delegated, as the highest act of grace towards her favorite, the office of passing sentence of death against all Christians—an office in discharging the duties of which he is said to have displayed uncommon activity. In subordination to him were the generals and other high military officials; while the chief civil appointments were sold to the highest bidders, since all civil office really meant unlimited power of extortion with impunity. Some of the higher civil functionaries thus contributed from their own stores large sums of money to the treasury, refusing at the same time all salary until the British power should be finally and completely annihilated in Oude! There was an active intelligence department, whose principal duty was the discovery of all persons eligible for pillage; and confiscations of every kind were rife throughout every portion of the Oude territory. In the city of Lucknow itself—which I have before designated as a very Sodom for wickedness—one of the most important items of revenue was derived from the myriads there who devoted their lives to infamy. One contractor, Mussamut Abbashi, had undertaken to pay to the State 60,000 rupees (£6,000) per annum, for only one particular resort of such unhappy persons. It is not without hesitation that one is led even to allude to such monstrosities; and yet, without so doing, how are the people of Great Britain to know the sort of material with which we have to deal in attempting to reorganize an empire, and elevate to the decencies and proprieties of civilized life a people so sunk in the filth and mire of utter shamelessness?

Another Case of Brutality in New York.

About a fortnight ago, says the N. Y. Tribune, an advertisement appeared in some of our city journals for a nurse from the country to take charge of an infant.—It was answered by a resident of the village of Westchestre, who was intrusted with the care of the child; and in the course of the following week its parents paid the nurse a visit, and expressed themselves satisfied with the appearance of things there. On the following day, or day but one after the nurse went or sent for Dr. McDermot of the village to attend the child, but on reaching the house he found the infant dead and arrived at the conclusion that it had been smothered. Dr. McDermot then interrogated the nurse, and obtained from her the real or assumed name of the mother and her place of residence in this city, with which information he came to New-York, and called at the house indicated, and inquired for Mrs. Howard. A lady of very prepossessing appearance soon presented herself and received him very politely, and stated that there was no Mrs. Howard residing there; that it was probably Miss Howard he desired to see. The doctor, taken a little aba , this intimation, felt somewhat at a loss how to proceed, but finally, encouraged by the frank manners of the lady, commenced to communicate the fact that a Mrs. Howard, representing herself to reside there, had given out a child to nurse; and—but before the doctor could get another word out, the lady, with all the blandness imaginable, informed the doctor that she was the mother of the child in question; the doctor became more puzzled than ever, and remarked that he had understood her to say there was no Mrs. Howard residing there, only a Miss Howard; whereupon the lady assured him that he had understood her correctly; that she herself was Miss Howard and the mother of the child; and it was not only hers, but not the first one she had had, and further she hoped it would not be the last one. Dr. McDermot then mustered courage to inform her ladyship that her offspring was dead; when she coolly replied that it was better off then. The doctor next inquired for the father of the child, intimating that it was necessary to see him and have something done in the matter of properly disposing of the deceased infant.—The doctor was at once furnished with the name of Mr.———, No.—Great Jones street, who manifested considerable anxiety to avoid a Coroner's investigation, and a willingness on his part to pay him liberally for furnishing a certificate that would insure an interment without any fuss about the matter. This the doctor declined doing, and proceeded to Portchestre for Coroner Morell, who held an inquest upon the body of the deceased infant. From a post mortem examination of the body, it was evident that the deceased came to its death by suffocation; but as it might have been accidental on part of the nurse, the Jury rendered a verdict to that effect.

The Right of Search and the Slave Trade.

(From the New York Daily Times.)

Our controversy with England on the Right of Search is at an end. According to our Washington advices the British Government concedes, in its fullest extent, the doctrine asserted by the United States, and abandons every pretension to the right of visiting, searching, detaining or arresting American vessels for any purpose whatever. England acknowledges the entire and perfect immunity of American ships upon the high seas, and will instruct her officers to act accordingly.

Various motives will be ascribed to Great Britain for having made this important concession. A large portion of our own people will probably suppose that she has done it from pure fear of our power. The French press will ascribe it to the habit England has fallen into of yielding everything which America claims. We have no doubt that it is due to a conviction on the part of the English Government that the right she has asserted is of little practical value—that no good is to be accomplished by its exercise against an unwilling nation, and that the constant disturbance of the peaceful relations of the two countries—the angry contentions and the perils to commerce which it occasions—are far more serious evils than any which will follow her abandonment of the right. It is felt to be her interest and that of the whole world, that she should remain on terms of amity and cordial friendship with the United States; and to that end she is willing to make every sacrifice which the national honor will permit.

But this prompt and most honorable conduct on the part of England imposes duties upon us, which we can no longer neglect without forfeiting our self-respect and the regard of the civilized world. We owe it to ourselves, and to all other Christian nations, to take prompt and effective measures to clear our flag from the fearful responsibility which now rests upon it, of protecting and perpetuating the Slave-trade. We have refused to permit England to search our ships, suspected of the traffic, and have declared that the duty of detection belongs to ourselves. We have asserted our exclusive sovereignty over our own vessels on the high seas, and have declared to the whole world that we alone are responsible for their conduct and their character. We owe it therefore, to ourselves, as well as to other nations, to institute some effective means of preventing this gross abuse of the American flag. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the existence of the slave trade at the present is due almost entirely to the immunity which it receives from the flag of the United States. Upon the coast of Africa—on the Coast of Cuba—wherever slavers prosecute their inhuman traffic, they secure impunity for themselves and success for their trade by the use of the American flag. This is too notorious to be denied or doubted. Nearly every other nation has conceded to Great Britain, by treaty the right to visit its vessels and prevent any such abuse of its national colors: the American flag is the only one with which they cannot interfere, and it is, therefore, the one which is always used.

Our Government cannot maintain its present attitude of indifference on this subject without loss of character in the eyes of the civilized world. We have declared the Slave-trade illegal—we have put it upon the same footing as piracy—we have most stringent laws against its prosecution—and yet the fact remains that its existence is due solely and exclusively to the apathy of our Government, and our criminal neglect to take measures for its suppression. This state of things should exist no longer. Let us stop the slave-trade, or else let us brave the public sentiment of Christendom and abolish the laws by which we condemn it. The prompt concession of England to our demands on this subject has imposed upon us still stronger obligations to co-operate with her in the accomplishment of this end.

The State of Europe.

The Emperor of the French has denied, through the non-official columns of the Moniteur, that he has recently made any extraordinary armaments or levies of soldiers and sailors. But all the world knows the value of official or non-official statements in the Moniteur; and the Government and people of England, unless they be stupid as ostriches, will look at the facts of Europe and judge for themselves. Whether the armaments of our neighbours be ordinary or extraordinary, our duty is the same;—to be prepared for all emergencies; to hold his own; and to justify to foes as well as to friends, the position we have long held, and cannot lose without disgrace and ruin;—that of the first maritime Power in the world.

If the Emperor of the French had not a great army—if he did not do all in his power to strengthen himself on his precarious throne—if he did not increase his means of offence and defence not only against Europe but against his own people—he would not act with the sagacity and determination which his opponents as well as his admirers admit him to possess; but he would court his own downfall. Without a large army to support the system of repression which he has established, France—or, at all events, that portion of it which is educated, refined and polished, which loves liberty, and which in times of civil commotion, leads all the rest—would not endure for a week the utter deprivation of the right of discussion, and the concentration into the hands of one self-willed and inflexible despot of the whole patronage and authority of the State. It is natural that such an army should look to its creator for employment; that it should seek war as the field of advancement and so-called "glory;"—and that its leaders should desire opportunities of proving their mettle, and acquiring rank and pay, as earnestly as physicians look for patients and barristers for briefs.

The Emperor of the French knows what he is about. He has studied the history of Europe, and understands it. His sympathies are not with that spirit of liberty—out of the troubles excited by which his uncle arose at the end of the last century, to dazzle and overawe the world—but he knows that spirit still exists, and still perturbs the mind of mighty population. English statesmen of all parties who peddle with foreign politics, or ignore them, and men who love the peace of to-day better than the security of to-morrow, will neither see nor confess the great truth which is patent and palpable to Louis Napoleon, and to every Sovereign in Europe, that the state of the Continent is rotten and unnatural. With the sole exception of this country, there is not one great empire within its boundaries in which the people have the management of their own affairs. Europe, so highly civilized—the cradle of art, science and literature—is, with this exception, and that of the small States of Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sardinia, Switzerland, and other still pettier powers or municipalities, which exist upon the sufferance of their rapacious neighbours—enslaved by military autocrats and tyrants. All Europe ardently desires to be free, and the more ardently in proportion to the enlightenment of the people. From the close of the American War of Independence down to the present day, liberty has been but a dream, and the attempt to secure it a massacre. For that period—long compared with one man's life, but a short time in the history of nations—there has been nothing but war and the fear of war;—nothing even in the most peaceful days of transition from one evil to another but an armed truce, or the suspension of hostilities by the physical inability of the combatants to continue their strife. From 1786 to 1815 there were bitter and bloody struggles that settled nothing. From 1815 to 1830 there was sheer exhaustion. From 1830 to 1848 there was renewal of the conflict, renewal of the distrust, and renewal of the exhaustion. From 1848 to 1852 there were fresh struggles, fresh wars, and the pouring out of blood like water. From 1852 to 1858 there has been redoubled despotism, augmented armies of repression, and the marshalling of the young men of the nations by hundreds of thousands to aid in the subjugation of their own countrymen, and the general enslavement of Europe.

Despotism has the upper hand at present and strives to keep it. And every one of the several despotisms that oppress this fairest portion of the globe is not only alarmed at the idea of relaxing its grip upon the neck of its own subjects, but is dissatisfied with the geographical boundaries imposed upon it by the Treaty of Vienna, of 1815. France desires Belgium and the Rhine. Austria wants the Danubian Provinces, that she may have the command of the mouths of the Danube. Prussia covets large additions to her territory, and especially the Protestant Dukedoms and Principalities of Germany, together with Hamburg, Bremen, and Lubeck. Russia defeated for a while, and only for a while, longs to obtain Constantinople, and an outlet to the great ocean from which she is threatened to be excluded in less than a century by the gradual drying up and shallowing of the Baltic. Italy, that never was free, but that has always hoped, prayed and struggled for the inestimable right of self-government, desires to expel the hated Germans from Lombardy and Piedmont, to deprive the Pope of his temporal sovereignty, to dispossess King Ferdinand of his throne, and place him in history among the ex-Roys of Christendom—the Stuarts and the Bourbons—as an additional warning to the potentates of the earth that the long-suffering of the nations comes to an end sooner or later, and that retribution follows upon the heels of guilt, whether the guilty man be the wearer of a golden crown or a cotton nightcap. Look where we will in Europe, there is not a spot, except the British isles, that offers the spectacle of rational liberty or political permanence.—Look where we will, the Sovereigns of Europe are armed, not against England, but against their own people, and against the rival despots that desire acquisition of territory at their expense. The boundaries of the several States are arbitrary, not natural. The nations are discontented, restless unruly; the Sovereigns are alarmed, and not one dares to disband his troops, lest a rapacious enemy, without or within, should seize him unawares. It is in vain for the Moniteur to deny that France has warlike intentions. Warlike intentions and warlike preparations are a positive and all-pervading necessity, both of the Emperor and of the country.

Had Lord Palmerston been equal to the occasion when war was actually raging in Europe—had he and his advisers seized the opportunity of the hostilities in the Crimea to make a real war, and bring about a real peace—it is possible that ere this time many of the questions which still alarm and exasperate Europe might have received a satisfactory and permanent solution: and that the settlement of 1815 would have been reconsidered with a view to the future.—But the opportunity was lost. Nothing was settled, not even the small question of the Danubian Principalities; and all the bitter and dangerous work has yet to be done;—all the expense—and more upon its back—has to be reincurred;—and the world has to be perturbed with a still greater perturbation than the last, that the common safety of Europe may be secured; and its nations left to the management of their own affairs, untroubled by the rivalries and animosities of unscrupulous tyrants.

It would, doubtless, be as agreeable to many thousands of persons in England, as it would be to Mr. Bright, if the quarrels of Continental nations with their rulers or with one another, could be fought out without the direct or indirect aid of England; and that we could leave our house open and unprotected, unbolted, unbarred, and unwatched, while strong gangs of thieves were prowling about in every direction.—But whatever individuals may do, nations have no right to rely upon the innate comity and goodness of others, or to refuse to take precautions against insult and aggression. The Emperor of the French may mean well to England. We think he does; but he will mean just as well if England have a large and invincible fleet; and England will be all the better enabled to act as umpire in the disputes and wars that must arise in Europe before Europe can enjoy either peace or satisfaction.

Englishmen may not fear invasion, or may think that the old woman cited by Mr. Bright was right to laugh at it; but what they dislike, and will not tolerate, is unpreparedness amid perils which are beyond the control of England, and which by the merest accident may in twenty-four hours set all Europe in a blaze. The country knows what disgrace and loss our unpreparedness cost us in the Crimean struggle; and neither to punish strong men like Napoleon III. and John Bright on the one side, nor cowardice and women who can look calmly on at bloodshed on the other, will it vex the ire of a civilized time. England owes it to herself, as well as to the great cause of liberty, of which she has been the prophet, the teacher and the example, to be as strong as she is free, and as ready as she is enlightened.—Illustrated London News.

DEGRADATION OF A FRENCH OFFICER.—The Lyons papers gives an account of the ceremony of degrading Lieutenant de Mercy, who had been tried by Court-martial, and found guilty of the murder of one of his officers, and whose sentence had been commuted to transportation. The Imperial Commissioner addressed him in these words:—"De Mercy—You owe your life to the Empress, whose noble heart, good among all, feels for all who suffer. Pray, and repent. Your sword is to be immediately broken and the fragments cast at your feet. Who knows but that hereafter, when purified by a long and painful expiation, you will not be able, acting on the instincts of your race, to grasp another sword, and employ it in honor in distant climes?" De Mercy, it is said, wept on hearing these words. The ceremony of degradation was then performed in the public square in presence of the troops of the garrison, and in front of his own regiment, the officer commanding saying—"Louis Charles Edouard de Mercy, you are unworthy of serving in the French army. In the name of the Emperor I degrade you." The senior sergeant then proceeded to remove his military cap, the gold lace from his coat, his epaulets, the buttons from his tunic, and, drawing his sword, broke it into pieces, and flung the fragments on the ground. The troops then marched past the prisoner, who was afterwards conducted under a guard to the civil prison.

English and Scotch Farmers in Ireland.

An interesting paper was read on Friday evening before the members of the Royal Dublin Society. The author is a Scotch land agent, resident in Dublin, and largely engaged in purchasing farms for parties immigrating to Ireland from England and Scotland. Mr. Miller, who is a competent authority, states that during the years when famine and emigration were at their height, a vast quantity of land was sold hurriedly, and often mercilessly, in the Encumbered Estates Court. At this period many advantageous purchases were made, and even since that time settlers from the sister countries have been numerous, but not, he thinks, in such numbers as the fertility of the soil, the mildness of the climate and the low figure at which excellent land may be leased, would lead a person intimate with Ireland to expect. Under this conviction, he has opened a correspondence with every English and Scotch proprietor in the country, with the object of ascertaining the extent of their holdings, their productiveness, and such other information as may be likely to remove the prejudice entertained in England especially against Irish immigration. The English and Scotch farm settlers in the Green Isle now amount to above 700, and already their influence is felt on the population around them. Wherever they have settled an immediate improvement is visible in the neighborhood. Their very presence inculcates habits of industry and cleanliness among the people, which are put within their reach by the generosity of the strangers, who pay them 6d or 8d a-day more than they ever received before. Mr. Miller says:—"So sensible are the poor men of the benefits conferred on them by British farmers, that when a farm is to be let, their great desire is that it may be taken by a Scotch or English farmer, for then they would be sure of good employment and regularly paid wages. The young Irish lads are very easily learned, and make capital ploughmen, and nothing delights them more than getting charge of a pair of horses. The laborer has a few additional comforts; there is now an almost total absence of rags, and he is generally respectably clothed." In one district a Scotch gentleman, who is also an excellent agriculturalist, took a large farm and had an excellent crop of turnips the first year. In that locality it was believed that a turnip could not be grown much larger than a potato, and it was often impossible to see the crops from the luxuriance of the weeds which hid them. Irish farmers, and even some landowners, came from the surrounding district to see the crop, and were astonished at the bulk of it, as well as the mode of culture; and the example of good husbandry thus shown has been largely followed.

THE NEW YORK INEBRIATE ASYLUM.—The location of the New York Inebriate Asylum having been fixed at Binghamton, the citizens of that place have donated to the Trustees of the Institution two hundred and fifty-two acres of land for their use and occupancy, at an estimated value of fifty thousand dollars. The buildings will be situated a little way outside the village, on a plateau of two hundred and fifty-two feet elevation above the river, commanding a view of the Chesango and Susquehannah valleys to a distance of twenty miles. The work of excavation commences this week, and the walls will go up as rapidly as the funds will warrant. About fifty thousand dollars have been subscribed, a portion of which is paid in already. Among the subscribers are no less than eight hundred physicians, four hundred clergymen, ninety judges, and ninety editors, the President of the United States and his Cabinet Officers, Justices McLean, Grier, and Wayne, Martin Van Buren, and other distinguished gentlemen. The Trustees are sixty in number, and are men of the highest character as individuals and men of business.

AN EXQUISITE MAYOR.—The Worcester Chronicle gives the following as a verbatim copy of a letter from a chief magistrate of a certain corporation:—"Dear Sir,—On Monday next I am to be made a Mare, and shall be much obliged to you if as be as you will send me down by the Coach some provisions fitting for the occasion, and I am to ax my brother, the old Mare, and the rest of the Beasts. I am, sir," etc.—The above was answered by a wag, into whose hands it fell, as follows:—"Sir,—In obedience to your orders, I have sent per coach two bushels of the best oats; and as you are to treat the old Mare, have added some bran to make a mash."

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

WEDNESDAY, July 1.

MR. R. F. GOURLAY AT THE BAR.

When the House resumed at half-past seven,

Mr. FOLEY said that Mr. Gourlay had been in attendance for several days, in order to be heard at the bar of the House, but the order had never been reached.—He moved that he be now heard.—Carried.

Mr. GOURLAY, whose venerable appearance at once enlisted the sympathies of all who heard him, then appeared at the bar, and proceeded to address the House, but on account of his distance from the gallery he was but imperfectly heard by the reporters. He said that, in view the value of the time of the House he should be brief, and he trusted allowance would be made for his age and infirmities. He appeared at that bar, not as a suppliant—not to beg anything of any one, but to defend the rights of a British subject—rights which in his person had been outraged the last forty years. Yes, it was now 40 years since he was arrested in Upper Canada, on account of standing up for the most essential right of British subjects, that of assembling in public meeting to seek the correction of abuses. He was honourably acquitted;—but a special law was enacted, pointed at him, and he was again arrested, thrust into prison, and banished illegally and unconstitutionally. After he was banished, this iniquitous law was repealed. Its sole object, his destruction, having been accomplished. The pamphlet which he held in his hand recorded these facts. It also recorded the rancour and malignity of the man who was the chief instrument of his ruin and the bitter enemy of popular rights. That man's malignity against him, he doubted not, still remained unabated.

"Forgiveness to the injured doth belong,
He never pardons who hath done the wrong."

It had been asserted that his principles were republican in the extreme. He denied this. As early as the year 1799 he held a captains commission in the volunteers, and seven years afterwards he offered, at the head of a military corps, to cross the English channel and take Paris, while Bonaparte was fighting the Russians in Poland. And, during the Canadian rebellion, he remained five months in Cleveland, doing all he could to discourage that movement, for which he was thrice thanked by Sir Francis Bond Head. He looked upon the connection of Canada with Great Britain as the best pledge for the world's freedom, and believed that annexation to the United States was to be avoided above all things. At the same time he was not unfriendly to the United States, but he denied that he was obnoxious to the charge brought against him by his enemies, that he was a republican. He was attached to no party, but had always laboured to be useful to his fellowmen. And it was in that cause that he had become zealous for Reform in Canada. He had hoped that Canada would have occupied a foremost place in the advances of civilization, and he had anxiously watched the progress of Canadian Government. But what had he witnessed? He was sorry to say no good whatever. The rebellion—what was that but an effervescence of angry passions stirred up by the disregard of justice and common sense.—Responsible Government—what had that effected? An unblushing waste of the public money, and a monstrous debt. It was asked in a newspaper of this morning—by what policy are we to be governed, by what principles are we to be guided, to whom shall we look for the measures that are needed to save the country from ruin? For his own part, he was of opinion that a Convention of the people should be called. Having said thus much of a general character, he should now proceed to the special reasons which had brought him here. Mr. Gourlay continued to speak; but in so low a voice that almost the whole of what he said was lost to the reporters' gallery. We understood him to complain that a memorial presented to the House last year had been set aside on the ground that it was couched in disrespectful language, though he contended that there was nothing in it that could be justly considered disrespectful. He then gave an account of the report of the Committee which had investigated his case, and which had stated that he came to this country in 1814, and had acquired considerable property by marriage, and purchase; that he had in the course of his residence here become aware of certain grievances, and had sought to obtain the appointment of commissioners to investigate them; that in consequence of the attention he had called to these things, public meetings had been held, whose proceedings had been published, and had been approved of generally by the people of the country; that for his share in these discussions, however, he had been arrested and tried at Kingston, and having been acquitted, was again tried and acquitted at Brockville; that he thence proceeded on business to New York, and was on his return arrested at Niagara and confined in a cell for five weeks, having been in all eight months in prison; that he was, during that period, debarred from the sight of and from all communication with his friends; and that he was thus reduced to such a state of mind as unfitted him from defending himself, or even from comprehending the nature of the trial to which he was subjected; that he was sentenced to perpetual banishment, for the alleged crime of refusing to leave the country on the order of two Legislative Councillors; that this sentence was illegal and unjust

The County Council.

The County Council has closed its session, and, as a principal result of its labors, we have a By-law authorizing the issue of six thousand pounds in debentures, to be applied to the repairing and construction of the roads and bridges in the United Counties. It will be fresh in the memory of the ratepayers that not long ago, a By-law was submitted to them, asking their consent to issue debentures to the amount of fifty thousand pounds, to be expended in the construction of certain gravel roads. That proposition was unanimously rejected, and consequently fell through, greatly to the mortification of certain parties who had laid out to enjoy themselves in the distribution of the money. Now, we have a more modest proposition, it is simply to borrow for the general improvements of the roads, and the sum set down is only one eighth of that originally demanded, but there is one very wide difference in the proceedings of the Council. Taking a lesson by the determined attitude of the ratepayers against mortgaging their properties, the Council are now prepared to set the rate-payers aside, to bid them defiance, and settle that within their own body, which they dare not submit to the people. For if it was right to ask a concurrence from the rate-payers, when a special rate was to be struck, to meet the expenditure on leading gravel roads, it is alike proper that a similar course shall be adopted, when a special rate is imposed to improve the ordinary roads. However, some who are members of the Council, and some who are not, taking a disgust at the hardness of the times outside, are determined to set a little afloat, that they can more especially dabble in, and therefore we may look forward to systematic borrowings to raise the wind wherewith to comfort these men, while additional burdens are imposed upon the taxeable property of the Counties to be borne by the people. Municipalities have already borrowed to such an extent that it would be impossible for the country to meet its obligations, if the demand were made upon it, and in the face of this incipient bankruptcy, these hitherto provident counties must be led into the common folly. If there was a great undertaking to be carried on, involving the expenditure of a sum of money much beyond our ordinary revenue, then there might be reasonable ground for going into the market with our mortgages, but in the matter of the improvement of common roads, it is most improvident to spare the present year by spreading its assessment over future time. The advocates of borrowing are apt to justify the temporary relief it brings, by the reflection that those who succeed them, will inherit their properties, and may fairly be entailed with the payment of the mortgages which represent their improvement. There is no more pernicious doctrine than this, in public or private economy, it ought to be the first object so to leave one's property as that it shall bring enjoyment to its possessor, else the mere possession is a source of inquietude and disappointment. This is no more applicable in individual cases than in those which embrace communities. And those who justify the present enjoyment at the expense of the rising generation, are guilty of a gross neglect of the rules which should regulate the management of their estates. That those who are expected to come after us will not thank us for our care in their behalf, is an unjustifiable assumption, and should never be allowed to escape the lips of any but a misanthrope; our duty is to bear our own burdens, and as far as possible to relieve our descendants from theirs; with such a mind a community would pause well before they throw debt in the distance, to secure a present enjoyment.—Good roads are a great comfort, but unencumbered estates are a first condition of prosperity.

Public Property.

A "Ratepayer" complains of some of the public streets in the North Ward being enclosed with the adjoining properties of certain persons, although others who were in possession have been made to open them. By the question put by a "Ratepayer" it would seem that the privileged delinquents are among the rich, and he very innocently enquires whether it is a correct discrimination to hunt the poor and pass by the rich? Correct or not, it is one that is commonly made, and always looked for by the fortunate few. And, as to the Town Council, until the body of Electors take the matter in hand, and select men who have the public interest at heart, instead of leaving their nomination and election to little cliques, they need expect nothing better than a sacrifice of the weak at the shrine of the strong.

☞ A correspondent runs our columns to communicate to the noisy on the eve of the twelfth, the annoyance their inaugurations of that day is calculated to inflict upon the sick, and invalided. We are well satisfied that such nocturnal demonstrations are of the most inhuman kind, quite unconnected in the minds of the parties with either treason or consequence, and that but a whisper of suffering will be accepted as sufficient ground for their abandoning from the amusement.

Provincial Parliament.

Representation by Population.

MONDAY, July 5th.

Mr. DUPRESNE, at twenty minutes after eleven, moved that the House do now adjourn; but the motion was then lost on a division.

Mr. FOLEY said the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Langevin) was far more ingenious than ingenuous, inasmuch as he had stated that the Opposition had been against Representation by Population, without adding that the ministry had been equally opposed to it. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. McGEE said the Attorney General had very pointedly said that there was only one member from Lower Canada in favour of Representation by Population.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER said he had referred to the hon. member for Montreal, and he was astonished that while in his speech on the address, he appeared to be opposed to the principle, he had since expressed himself in favour of it.

Mr. McGEE said when he referred to this subject the other night, he stated it as his conviction that the Government had not satisfied the expectations of either section of the Province, by not declaring their own position on this question. (Hear, hear.)

Atty. Gen. CARTIER—In my speech, I stated that so long as the Union lasted, I would oppose Representation by Population, and that all the members from Lower Canada would vote with me.

Mr. McGEE said that under a system of constitutional Government, and in a country like Canada, he considered that no form of Government could last or ought to last unless numbers were made the main basis of representation, (hear, hear.) They might introduce numbers and taxation, or numbers and territory; but his firm belief was that no Government could be carried on honestly and in obedience with the wishes of the people, unless numbers were made the primary basis of power. (Hear, hear.) And he believed that in holding this opinion he did not stand alone in Lower Canada.—Whilst saying this, he did not desire it to be understood that he was in favor of the Bill now before the House—brought forward, as it was, as an isolated measure of reform. As he said in his remarks on the address, if a measure of this nature came alone, he would vote against it; but as a part of a constitutional change and accompanied with other safeguards, he had no hesitation in giving it his support. And those were the worst friends of Lower Canada who disguised from the people the fact that if there were an excess of population in Upper Canada the most suicidal policy to take was to deny the enforcement of the principle. (Hear, hear.) That the principle was just, and that it must be acted upon he had no more doubt than that the sun would rise to-morrow.—The hon. gentleman then proceeded to show that the Attorney General East was incorrect in stating that the question of Representation was not acted upon in the United States, and that it had not been asked for by statesmen other than Canadians. The late Mr. O'Connell, one of the ablest and most original politicians of the 19th century, contended that Ireland should be represented in accordance with population; and among other qualities of that gentlemen—perhaps it was a fault—he thought very highly of Attorney's General. (Laughter.) The Government were to blame because they had not propounded a scheme to take the question of Representation by Population out of the hands of agitators. But the whole burden of their song seemed to be this—

"Come day, go day,
God send Sunday."

(Laughter.) "Let us go through the session—let those persons we annually call together vote us the Supplies, and then they can go home—it is not a matter of the least importance whether the measures have been passed or not." Such was the tone of the Ministry; their great object appeared to be to get through the session. He regretted that the hon. member for Sherbrooke shrunk from the application of the principle he had advocated, and that he had refrained from asking for a Committee.—For three hours had the hon. gentlemen—as Sir Walter Scott said of Allan Cunningham's novels—treated them to fine passages leading them to nothing. (Laughter.) The people would have the constitutional changes which they demanded, and the Government which would not march at their head must be dragged at their tail. One of these changes was Representation by Population, and it must be brought about, accompanied by such other changes as would secure to Lower Canada her just rights. He repeated that standing alone, as a single question, he could not vote for the motion now before the House; but if Representation by Population was brought forward surrounded with proper checks and balances, he would have no hesitation in supporting it. (Hear, hear.)

Atty. Gen. CARTIER said the hon. member had not understood his (the Attorney General's) line of argument. He understood as well as, if not better than, the hon. member for Montreal, the principle of election prevailing in the United States. (Oh, oh.) In the case of the election of the President, if it took place in the House of Representatives it was not based upon the population. The gentleman went into a long statement to illustrate the position he took, but was listened to very impatiently by the House.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND said this important question had received additional significance from the hon. member for Sherbrooke bringing forward in connection with it, the principle of a Federal Union. The subject of a Federal Union had been discussed, and it must be answered. He desired to speak to the question in all its details, and several other members wished to address the House upon the same subject and as it was now midnight he suggested that the House should adjourn, in order that the question might be discussed at a time when the House was not tired out. He wished to show that the question was not simply one of Representation by Population but of a Federal Union, and one in which the interests of the people of Lower Canada was vitally affected. He moved the adjournment of the House.

A LADY PREBATE.—An old bishop of Durham, learned and lazy, lounged into the house of Lords, when, being the only member of the Episcopal bench present, he was called upon to perform the easy office of chaplain. The dignitary left the chamber in a "huff," and as in-going poor could not help inquiring what annoyed him. "No young bishops in the house? No young bishops in the house!" growled the ecclesiastical prince; adding, "Hang 'em! do they think that I am going to do their dirty work for 'em? Not I, sir not I."—And so the exemplary gentleman passed on.

An Attorney, before a bench of magistrates, a short time ago, told the bench, with great gravity, "That he had two witnesses in court in behalf of his client, and he was sure they would speak the truth, for he had no opportunity to communicate with them."

A HORRID WRETCH.—We had yesterday the particulars of a revolting transaction just come to light in Greenville. Harlan Hyde lost his wife a year ago. She was his third wife, and had been married only a year when she died, and was buried in the Greenville Cemetery. About one week ago, Hyde went to the Cemetery dug open the grave, and rifled it of what? does the reader imagine? Of a set of false teeth, that he might coin the gold plate, upon which the teeth were set, into money to put into his pocket! We dare say he meant to sell the teeth, too if he could find a purchaser. It is now currently reported and believed, in Greenville, that when his wife died, and while she laid dead in her shroud in the house, her affectionate husband attempted to remove the coveted teeth from her mouth, but the rigid muscle would not relax and he was consequently compelled to suspend operations for the time. But it was only a suspension. The purpose was merely postponed, not relinquished; and after brooding over the idea for twelve months he has finally put it in execution.—Hyde not only confesses to have done this horrible thing but is brazen enough to justify it.—Norwich, Connecticut, Courier.

We have heard of a man, reasonable in all other matters, who declared that he had been ruined, all his vast property swallowed by an earthquake. But when he was asked by strangers, "What earthquake, and where?" the ruined man, with a deeper look of injury upon him, would reply, confidentially, "That's it, that's just it. The earthquake, sir, was most shamefully hushed up."

The other day a gentleman gave a couple of cents to a woman who asked charity of him. "Two cents!" exclaimed she; "take them back, sir; I asked for charity; I can't do anything with two cents." "My dear madam," said the gentleman, "I beg you'll keep the cents and give them to some poor person."

A wag who was asked to buy a Bank Note Detector yesterday, said he would purchase it if it would detect a bank note in his pocket.

PATRIOTISM AND THE SLAVE TRADE.—If the Slave trade gains new vigor under the favoring auspices of the United States and France, let the admirers of the pagan virtue of patriotism mark that this atrocity has been kept alive by the prevalence of the sentiments of nationality. Guizot, in his Memoir of Sir R. Peel, laments that he was unable to stem the current of nationality feeling in the French Chamber of Deputies in 1842, and was obliged to abrogate the treaty of mutual search which had been concluded with Britain. In 1858 the American patriots insist upon giving free warrent to Slave Traders over the seas, provided they will hoist the American flag. How many Irish patriots also under the influence of excited national feeling have been the defenders of Slavery and the Slave Trade! In this instance the patriots have acted prejudicially to the onward progress of humanity in the world.

Expose of the French Emigrant Slave Trade.

(From the London Times.)

THE Ethiope, Captain Croft, a steamer belonging to the West Africa Steam Company, arrived at Monrovia, the capital of the settlement of Liberia, on the 14th of April. The captain on landing, was informed by ex-President Roberts that a French vessel, the Regina Cœli, which had been for some weeks collecting "emigrants" under the new system, had been the scene of a fearful catastrophe. These so-called emigrants had revolted during the absence of the captain, purser, and a few of the crew, who fortunately for themselves, had gone on shore for a short time. The seamen left on board, to the number of eleven, were murdered by the negroes, the doctor alone was spared and put on shore. The ignorant wretches, after perpetrating the deed, had taken possession of the vessel, and were known to be in the neighbourhood of Cape Mount. Shortly after Captain Croft received information, there came a formal request from the French Consul that the Ethiope, would if possible, recapture the vessel. The Ethiope set out accordingly. The Regina Cœli was known to be well armed, she conveying this class of emigrants are, it appears, well armed; and Capt. Croft made every preparation. But rightly believing that ex-President Roberts would exercise a moral influence on the blacks, that gentleman was requested to accompany the expedition. At nine o'clock the next morning they sighted the Regina Cœli, "quite unmanageable near the shore. "As we neared," says an eye witness, "we saw the decks crowded with people, who as soon as they saw the British flag, hung out a white shirt, and, the Ethiope coming within hailing distance, they made all possible demonstrations, by clapping their hands and closing their arms, thus expressing their joy at seeing a British ship, and their readiness to give themselves up." Mr. Roberts went on board, and when the blacks heard they were to be taken to Monrovia they danced and shouted with delight. Mr. Roberts having heard the account of these people, expressed his opinion that all the so-called emigrants were merely slaves, and had been regularly bought, shipped, and manacled just in the regular way, as practised on the coast for many a year.

The account the negroes gave of themselves leaves, indeed, no doubt of the fact. The irons with which they had been manacled were on board, and many of them retained the marks on their wrists and ankles. They were about 270 in all, but 100 had left before the Ethiope fell in with the ship. One of the men said that the greater part had been brought down from the interior and bought by the Frenchmen in the usual way. Others had come on board as labourers, he himself among the number, and had been suddenly seized, put in irons, and stowed away in the hold. By these means were the emigrants obtained, who, but for mutiny, were destined to "develop their faculties by contact with civilization" in the Island of Reunion, into Bourbon. The account given by them of the manner in which was, that it arose from the cook stabbing one of the people who had gone to the galley to get something to eat; but there can be little doubt that the deed was premeditated, and that the cook's violence, even if true, was only the signal for the raising.

This is the mutiny of a number of kidnapped slaves, bought, carried on board, chained in the usual way, and destined to be transported to the French plantations under the name of "voluntary emigrants." That the system is nothing more than the slave trade under another, which cannot be doubted. That the immigration of Africans and Asiatics to thinly peopled colonies is desirable we have always upheld, and even this French scheme might have been so worked as to be a blessing both to Africa and the Antilles. The various races which have been introduced into the British possessions have of late years prospered and been productive of prosperity to others.—The coolies in the Mauritius and Demarara, the Chinese in Australia, and even large bodies of negroes introduced into different islands, have had no reason to regret the change in their lot; and we hope that this kind of emigration will continue and increase. But nothing is more likely to check a really healthy supply of labour than such a nefarious traffic as has now been exposed. We trust that the French Government will no longer hesitate to discountenance proceedings which are ablenow to boast of the imperial approbation.

Serious Affair at Simon's Bay.

A correspondent of the London Daily News writes from the Cape of Good Hope under date April 16:

A serious affray took place last week between the crews of the English and Russian men-of-war at present in Simon's Bay. The following particulars have been received with respect to the cause and its result:—The crews of both ships were on shore on liberty, and the row was originated by an English invalid soldier, who lost an arm in the Crimea. He walked up to some of the Russian sailors, and taunted them of having robbed him of an arm; but said he was ready to show them he had one left. This led to a fight and the English sailors standing by seeing 5 or six Russians hitting their one-armed comrade, joined in the fight. Shortly after this another knot of belligerents were observed hustling each other, but whether this arose out of the same circumstance is not known. A Russian officer attempted to interfere, with a view to protect an Englishman who was attacked by a lot of Russians; the English sailor, however, struck the officer who came to his help.—The Russian sailors then pitched into the Englishman, and this led to a general muster on both sides. There were about 150 Russians and 100 English. The English were under the command of a marine, who drew them up in a line with their backs to the houses facing the bay, between Mr. Green's and Melville's stables. The Russians were drawn up in a line on the opposite side, along the edge of the bank which leads down to the beach. The English provided themselves with legs of tables, chairs, and sticks; and seeing the Russians gathering stones they set one of their men to work with a crowbar, who tore up the stones from the street and placed them in a heap. Near where the Russians formed there were a lot of handspikes and pieces of wood, which they possessed themselves of. Both parties being well armed, the marine asked the Englishmen if they were ready. They answered, "Aye, ready!" "Charge!" said he; and no sooner was the word given than at it they went. The air was filled with a volley of stones from both sides. It was a desperate affair for some five or ten minutes. Man after man was knocked down senseless, but it was evident that the battle was with the English; they set about it with great coolness, and all made their blows tell. The Russians at last gave way, and were charged down the bank. Some were driven into the water, the great body were pursued down over the jetty, and driven headlong over into their boats, which were lying alongside.—During the fight, we are told, the most savage cruelties were perpetrated on both sides When one man fell six others would run up and kick him. Many of the men's faces were much cut and bruised, but strange to say no very serious injuries were committed. It was thought at one time that one of the Russians were killed; he appeared to be quite dead. The man who knocked him down appeared to be delighted that he had "settled a——Russian," and he picked him up with great glee and threw him over the bank. The Russian recovered after lying insensible for about two hours.—Several of the English sailors have been brought up before the resident magistrate, charged with assaulting the Russians, and fined. One was proved to have ill-treated a Russian who was lying on the ground after being knocked down was sentenced to be sent to prison on rice water for six days.

Why is France Arming and Augmenting her Navy?

From the London Times.

We have the happiness to possess a Government which, if we are to believe all it tells us, has found means to conciliate France without condescending to any of the ordinary means of conciliation, and it is so much our interest to believe it that we are not disposed to weigh probabilities minutely, or call into question what some might consider very doubtful assertions. Let us, then, by all means, take it for granted that our diplomatic feud it is at an end, and that a state of feeling has succeeded very different from that which dictated the curt and acrid dispatch with which Count Walewski concluded the correspondence. Let us turn our minds to the exploits now enacting on the tropical plains of India, to the oratorical thunder launched against us from the temple of the Capitolian Jove at Washington, to the destinies of Commissioner Yeh, to the blood-stained valleys of Montenegro, or to whatever other quarter may challenge the attention of the political observer. Still there is one unfortunate fact which will force itself upon our attention in spite of the very best exertions we can make to persuade ourselves that the political atmosphere is quite clear on the side of France as we could desire. For what purpose, or in what quarrel—against whom or for whom—we know not, France is undoubtedly arming on a scale with a method, a system, and a deliberation truly formidable to all her neighbours,—whether, like Belgium, Piedmont, and Spain, in the consciousness of their inability to resist, they listen with no unreasonable trepidation for the first howl of the coming tempest,—or whether, like Austria, they know not how soon they may be compelled to fight for their dominions against a brave and well-disciplined enemy. France is certainly arming, and arming both by land and sea. Her army, already large, is undergoing considerable increase. She is just on the point of completing a railway which connects all her military stations with the fortifications of Cherbourg, a port constructed at enormous pains and at vast expense, and possessing every facility that skill can devise for the simultaneous embarkation of very large bodies of troops. France is, besides, busily engaged in the construction of a great steam fleet, armed and propelled on the very best and newest principles at present developed by the art of war; she is gathering up her colonial strength, and would appear to be on the eve of some vast enterprise, in the prosecution of which that strength is to be put forth to the utmost. Not only is the military clue at studiously strengthened and increased, but is beginning to submit a proclamation over clothing which shows itself native and more every day, and naturally makes us anxious about her relations with a country in which the balance is so completely poised down by the superior weight of the military class.

It is in vain that we seek for anything in the present condition of France which can account for the remarkable proceedings to which we most unwillingly allude. The finances of the country are in a state that must render any naval or military expenditure not absolutely called for by necessity for honor peculiarly expedient. The people of England have no wish nearer their hearts than to remain on the very best terms with their formible and warlike neighbor, and we are sure that there is no country in Europe which would regard a rupture with France with any other feelings than those of the most genuine abhorrence and dismay. We cannot believe for a moment that the enormous preparations which France is making are intended for defensive warfare, for there is not the slightest symptom of a wish in any quarter to attack her. Her form of government agrees entirely with the notions entertained by the Governments of the greater part of Europe, and we in England have long learnt to renounce the Quixotic notion of forcing our own ideas upon other nations. If France is happy, we are content she should be so in her own way, and desire nothing but to see her great, peaceful, and prosperous. Why, then, is France arming?

It may be that the peculiar form of Government in which France has seen fit to indulge necessitates some increase of the army for purposes of domestic repression, and we would much rather believe it is so than suppose she is marshalling her forces for some foreign war; but, if we grant the army is increased for the purpose of insuring domestic tranquillity, on what ground are we to account for the corresponding and contemporaneous augmentation of her fleet? The navy has always been a favorite force in England, because, among other reasons, it is a force which cannot readily be used for the purpose of coercing the people. In France the same principle must apply, and we are at a loss to know for what pacific purpose a large steam navy is being prepared. France has but few colonies, and those of inconsiderable extent. She has no large foreign commerce to protect, no refractory India to reconquer and reorganize. She has nothing to fear from a descent on her coasts from any foreign power. Why, then, is France arming and augmenting her navy?

We have a right to ask the question; for whatever be the enemy against whom the thunderbolt is forged, there is no doubt that these warlike preparations in a time of profound peace tend to inflict upon us, in common with the rest of our neighbours, many of the calamities and miseries of war. If France will insist on increasing her armies and her navies, she forces us, her neighbors and her allies, to do the same. We have too much at stake within this little island of ours to be content to exist by the permission and on the sufferance of any ally, however faithful—of any foreign Prince, however magnanimous. History warns us against incurring the fate of those nations who have trusted the power of the sword in other hands than those in which they were content to trust their freedom. If France is determined to arm we must either be content to lie at her mercy or prepare to arm too. If she increases her regular army we can hardly do less than call out and embody our militia. If she insist upon increasing her navy, she forces us most unwillingly, from the barest considerations of prudence, to undergo the expense of a Channel Fleet. This expenditure, which is not required for domestic purposes, nor for the defence of our colonies, nor for the reduction of the Indian rebellion, is purely of the nature of a war expenditure in self-defence, forced upon us by the threatening attitude of a power which tells us in the same breath that it is our cordial friend and sure ally. We should prefer other proofs of cordiality, friendship, and alliance than are to be found in an attitude which compels us either to trust ourselves blindly and entirely to the professions of a powerful neighboring State, or to hamper our Commerce, embarrass our finances, and retard necessary improvements for the purpose of keeping up a barren and unprofitable force to defend us against attacks which may certainly never have been contemplated, but which it is our bounden duty to render impossible. The time has arrived when we ought to speak plainly on this matter. We have had somewhat too much of compliment and grimace of late, and a little openness and sincerity on the part of England would be refreshing, were it only for their novelty. We would, then, take the liberty respectfully to submit to the Emperor Napoleon that it is the sincere wish of this country to be his good friend and true ally; that to this end we have made many sacrifices, and are prepared to make many more; but he asks too much of us if he expects that he is at once to enjoy whatever power, support, or influence his alliance with England may give him, and at the same time to inflict upon us, by his vast military and naval preparations, a war expenditure which we are most unwilling to incur, and which casts upon us many of the evils of a state of actual hostilities. In politics many things apparently discordant may be made compatible, but it is impossible that two powerful neighboring nations can at the same time be arming against each other and united in close alliance and cordial friendship.

ST. JOHNS, N. F., July 3.

The City of Washington, from Liverpool on the 23rd ult., passed Cape Race at eleven o'clock yesterday forenoon. She was intercepted by the news yacht of the Associated Press, which arrived here this afternoon with a summary of her news.—Her advices are four days later than those by the Arabia at Halifax, but are of no special importance.

The London Star gives a rumour that Mr. Dallas has expressed his satisfaction with regard to the arrangements of England on the question of the British cruisers in the Gulf of Mexico.

Proceedings of Parliament present nothing of peculiar interest to American readers. The House of Commons had declared the continuance of the paper duty impolitic, but had made no proposition for its abolition.

Very destructive fires had occurred in London, involving the loss of several hundred thousand pounds sterling. No particulars given in our dispatch.

The State prosecutions against the two book-sellers for circulating a libel against Louis Napoleon, ended in an explanation from them, and the rendition of a verdict of "not guilty."

The case of J. B. Gough, the celebrated American temperance lecturer, against Dr. Lees, for libel, resulted in favor of the former—the latter retracting the charges he had made.

There is nothing later from India.

FRANCE.

Rumours were still current of an approaching change in the Embassy of England. It was said General Pelissier would soon return to France; and that last report gave, as his successor to the mission in London, M. Drouyn de L'Huys.

It was reported that Piétri has been re-appointed Prefect of Police at Paris.

The Commercial affairs of France give renewed symptoms of improvement.

HOOPS AS A SAFEGUARD FROM SAVAGE DOGS.—In West Roxbury a few days since, as a lady was making a call upon her friend, an Irish girl in one of the adjoining yards loosed a savage watch-dog, which immediately jumped the fence and attacked the lady tearing her dress and skirt into shreds, from her waist down. In the attack the steel hoops became so twisted around the jaws of the dog as to prevent his tearing her flesh, which he only missed by the thickness of one garment. The dog, to extricate himself from the hoops, left, to the great relief of the lady, who was very much frightened, as well she might be.—The owner of the dog, on being notified of the fact, settled the matter to the entire satisfaction of the injured party.—Herald.

It is vain to stick your finger in the water, and, pulling it out, look for a hole; and equally vain to suppose that, however large a space you occupy, the world will miss you when you die.

Dinner Party at a Harem.

At the entrance of the dining room stood two Arab slaves richly attired. To each lady, as she entered, one of these held a beautiful silver bowl, while the other poured rosewater over her hands, from a vase of the same richly chased material. The little slave girls presented fine napkins, the ends embroidered in gold, on which each shook the rosewater from our fingers. The dining-room was a most luxurious apartment, closely latticed, for it looked into the streets of Stamboul, but cheerful and rich in crimson divans, and carved and painted flowers on the walls and ceiling. All had been done that was possible to make the cage bearable. Riza Pasha's harem is, I am told, one of the most "fashionable," which accounted for our seeing a European dining table adorned with a handsome centre piece, and four beautiful vases of flowers and fruit, after the French fashion.

The dinner service was of rare and beautiful china; the silver knives and forks were extremely handsome; the arrierits delicately fine; the flowers exquisitely arranged, and mingled with oranges and lemons, in the eastern fashion; the slaves were standing round three or four deep, awaiting our slightest sign; we felt still more in the land of dreams.

First of all, they placed to each guest a sparkling water-bottle and glass. Then a fine china plate containing a flat roll of a kind of rye-bread, called semeet, quite new and warm, and covered with a small seed which, not being a canary or linnet I objected to. Then soup was served—a great novelty in a harem; it was most excellent—chicken and vermicelli. Then came a dish of pilauf, of chicken and rice, done brown. I sat next to the chief wife, on her right hand; as the slave held the dish she pointed out the nicest piece, begging me to take them. The fair Circassian sat opposite to me. I was curious to see if they really liked the modern innovation of knives and forks. For the first few minutes they used them—evidently to do as we did; but the Circassian beauty, failing to secure the particular piece of chicken she coveted with a troublesome fork and spoon, threw those incompetent auxiliaries down, and grubbed successfully, and to her entire satisfaction, with her fingers. She then looked at me and laughed; and showing me how to take a piece of bread between my fingers, begged us to eat a la Turque, which they were all doing themselves, fast and furious; and, to please them, we accordingly picked a few chicken bones with our fingers.

We had all three been enchanted with the fair Circassian, as I have told you—with her beauty, her winning yet lofty manners, and exquisite grace; we had seen her smoke, and admired her still; we had even forgiven her for loving the barbarous noise in the "concert of music;" but to see her lick her fingers up to the last joint after each dish—to see her lick her favourite tortoiseshell spoon bright after successive, and never-to-be-believed enormous platefuls of sweet pancakes daubed with honey, and tarts too lucious for the Knave of Hearts!—this was too much for Venus herself to have done with impunity; we were perfectly disenchanted long before the feast was over. The rest were not quite so bad, (excepting "Madame Liston," who might as well have had a trough at once;) but we began to feel rather sick after the first few dishes were dispatched, and the animal passions of some of the ladies began to be roused by their favourite sweets and jellies, which they tore to pieces with their fingers and threw down their throats in large lumps. The jester waited at table, presenting the principal dishes with jokes, which caused bursts of laughter from the ladies and the slaves in attendance, who seem perfectly at home and on very free and easy terms with their mistresses, notwithstanding their complete submission to them. The jester was a wild and most extraordinary looking woman with an immensity of broad humor and drollery in her face. We thought it quite as well that we could not understand the jokes at which the fair Circassian, between the intervals of licking her fingers and spoon, and popping tit-bits on our plates, laughed so complacently, and which sometimes obliged the Arabs and eunuchs at the door to dive under the arras to conceal their uncontrollable fits of mirth.—In and Around Stamboul.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—Next Monday is the 12th of July and it is, as I suppose, the intention of sundry persons (whether members of the Orange Society or not, not being sufficiently informed I cannot say) to commence at 12 o'clock on Sunday night to give us divers and sundry hints, in the shape of a hedge-fire of gunshots from that till daylight, that the day has actually arrived. Now, Sir, my object in troubling you on the subject is to suggest to the folks who thus amuse themselves, that, even in ordinary times, what is fun to them is often the cause of serious mischief and injury to others—at this time of the year when people, naturally delicate, are rendered still more so from the enervating effects of the sultry weather and are wakeful and nervous at nights, these startling sounds, so often repeated at the dead of night, frequently produce very distressing, and sometimes even dangerous effects: but such thoughtless conduct is still more objectionable just now, as there are, as I am informed, more than the average number of persons unwell at the present time from various causes.

I would simply put it to these young gentlemen, whether it is not then their duty to forego this amusement next Sunday night upon their being informed that their indulgence in it may be the cause of much distress and suffering to more than one fellow-creature?

I speak feelingly on the subject myself, having had an attack of fever extremely aggravated from this cause some years ago.

Perhaps being of the fair sex myself myself members of the Orange Ladies' Aid Society can use their influence to prevent the annoyance alluded to.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
P.

Peterboro', July 5th, 1858.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—As the guardian of the people's rights, I take the liberty of asking you a few questions in reference to the opening of the streets in the North Ward, in which a large number of the Ratepayers of the Town are deeply interested:—

1st, Is A, because he is rich, allowed to keep the highway fenced in for a pleasure ground; and B, C, and D, because they happen to be poor and only occupying a small portion of the street to raise a few vegetables for their families, forced to leave their shanties with what other improvements they have made at the order of the Town Council? I ask, Mr. Editor, is this common justice, is it such conduct as the Ratepayers expect from gentlemen sworn to act impartially?

2nd. Although it is well known that the road over the Smithtown Hill at present travelled, is more inconvenient and unsafe than the enclosed street to both town and country, yet the favoured ones in the Ward say that, having had possession for the last fifteen or twenty years, they will keep it enclosed in defiance of the Town authorities.

Yours &c.,
RATEPAYER.
